

power in America to destroy the essential liberties of human beings. There cannot be while the Constitution lasts.

Mr. President, I shall finish in a moment. I know the hour is late. I will ask Senators to hear me while I conclude.

I believe America needs an education in the value of human liberty right now more than she needs all the money and all the prosperity that God, in His goodness, might pour out upon us.

Mr. President, I think we have used the word "liberty" without thinking about its meaning. It has become rather ritualistic. I think the Fourth of July long ago lost its significance. I think we see the flag and forget that it is the flag of liberty. We sing the hymn—

My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty—

with never a thought of its meaning.

I walk around this Capitol scene, and I see the symbols of liberty, but very infrequently do I hear anyone dwell on the meaning of liberty to human beings and on the value of freedom to men and women.

I would to God that by some means I could find the power to say here, and say somewhere else where America might hear it, what freedom means, what liberty means, to men like ourselves and like our fellowmen.

O Mr. President, it is more than cotton, it is more than balanced budgets, it is more than victories on battlefields. The highest spiritual value in the national life is liberty. The soul of the Republic is liberty. The source of the inspiration which makes the citizen is liberty.

As I have said, I stand here and see the symbols. I have stood before the monument to Daniel Webster on one of the public squares here and read the language inscribed there:

Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable!

And I have wondered just what was in his mind, just whence came the inspiration.

"Liberty and union, one and inseparable." The historian might say that the great Senator and statesman was arguing that we had to preserve the Union in order to preserve liberty. Oh, no! "One and inseparable." We have to preserve liberty in order to preserve the Union. He meant both.

Every now and then I go to the railroad station to take the train for my home in North Carolina, and I see before the station the figure of Columbus on the prow of his ship, coming across the Atlantic in the spirit of liberty, and opening up all this New World to the human race, and I observe that he looks to the dome of the Capitol of the United States, on which stands another symbol of liberty.

Then I look upon the face of the Union Station and I read the legend:

Sweetener of hall and of hut.
Bringer of life out of naught.
Freedom: O fairest of all the daughters of time and of thought.

I pray God, Mr. President, that we may not even give here the appearance of undertaking to take from the farmers of my land their freedom, even though we should say they wish it to be done. I devoutly pray that come what may, though all of material value may be taken, the blessings of liberty may be preserved to us and our children even as brave fathers preserved it for us.

TITLE OF UNITED STATES TO LANDS IN TERRITORIES AND INSULAR POSSESSIONS—POSTPONEMENT OF A BILL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on March 20 the Senate passed the bill (S. 1699) to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or Territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription. MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God of wisdom and our Heavenly Father, too, reveal Thyself to our thoughts by breathing upon us the spirit of good will and cooperation and by relieving us of any fear or discouragement. All things shall be made plain when we are in Thy presence. Come forth, blessed Master, as a messenger of a good day, and may we open our minds to appropriate Thy teaching. May we all rejoice that we are heirs of a common salvation, children of a common Father, and as servants of the public; may we be bound together by a common aspiration. We beseech Thee that Thou wouldst keep us this day without sin and steadfast in all good works to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 24, 1934, was read and approved.

CATTLE AS BASIC AGRICULTURAL COMMODITY

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 7478) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up the conference report upon the bill H.R. 7478, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7478, Rept. No. 1051) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make advances to the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes, and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, under rules and regulations to be promulgated by him and upon such terms as he may prescribe, to eliminate diseased dairy and beef cattle, including cattle suffering from tuberculosis or Bangs' disease, and to make payments to owners with respect thereto."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert: "To amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle and other products as basic agricultural commodities, and for other purposes"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7478) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment no. 1: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill authorizing the making of advance rental and benefit payments in the case of the dairy and beef-cattle industries, and inserts a broader provision which makes the sums, when appropriated, available for any of the purposes of section 12 (a) and (b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and to support and balance the markets for such industries. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 2: This amendment includes peanuts as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and defines processing thereof for the purposes of that act, and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 3: This amendment includes rye, flax, and barley as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 4: This amendment includes grain sorghums as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 5: The effect of this amendment is to authorize the appropriation of $150,000,000 for the elimination of diseased dairy and beef cattle, the purchase and transfer of dairy cows to farms which do not have dairy stock for the purpose of supplying milk and milk products for noncommercial family use, and for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes. Not to exceed $50,000,000 of the sum authorized may be used for the last-stated purpose. The amendment further specifies that no processing tax should be levied to reimburse the expenditures authorized.

The House recedes with an amendment which reduces the authorization from $150,000,000 to $50,000,000. These amounts, if and when appropriated by Congress, are to be used for the elimination of diseased dairy and beef cattle and for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes.

The provision of the Senate amendment making new funds available for the purchase and transfer of dairy cows to farms which do not have dairy stock and for the purpose of supplying milk and milk products for noncommercial family use are eliminated.

The provision of the Senate amendment that no processing tax shall be levied to reimburse expenditures under this section is eliminated, for the proceeds of processing taxes under existing law are not available except for the purposes of section 12 (b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and therefore would not be available for the purpose of reimbursing appropriations made under authority of this act.

On amendment no. 6: This amendment amends the provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into marketing agreements. It broadens the class of parties with whom agreements can be made to include producers, and clarifies the provision so that express authorization is given to enter into agreements with parties handling agricultural commodities and products in competition with or affecting interstate or foreign commerce.

On amendment no. 7: This amendment amends the provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which determines the fair exchange value of basic agricultural commodities by inserting a provision including interest on mortgages, taxes, and freight rates as elements in the determination of current average farm price and fair exchange value. The Senate recedes.

On amendment to the title: The House recedes with a clerical amendment to the title.

MARVIN JONES,
H. P. FULMER,
WALL DOXEY,
CLIFFORD R. HOPE,
J. ROLAND KINZER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think the statement fully explains the essence of the conference report, and unless someone wants to ask some questions I move the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I look over amendment numbered 5—I understand that is the one I had some conversation with the gentleman about the other day—it seems to me that that is in fairly good shape. I wish the gentleman would tell us briefly about it.

Mr. JONES. That provides for an additional authorization of $50,000,000 to follow out substantially two of the purposes named in the La Follette amendment, one the distribution of beef and dairy products through the Surplus Relief Corporation, and then the use of the funds in carrying out the program for the elimination of tubercular livestock and stock afflicted with other diseases.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman is of opinion that that is about all that could be consistently used during the next year?

Mr. JONES. Yes. Of course there is no limit as to how much could be used for relief purposes, but this will provide for a reasonable program. I want to be perfectly fair. This is merely an authorization. We are going to endeavor to get the money; but whatever money is available, the money in either fund may be used for these purposes, and I am thoroughly in accord with the purposes suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. For the purpose of the RECORD, because certain Members have asked me concerning it, is it not true that the $50,000,000 will be an outside appropriation, not to be reimbursed from the processing tax?

Mr. JONES. That is clear enough. Certainly the $50,000,000 is not subject to the processing tax. This would make it available for that purpose, even though the other fund may be reduced. As a matter of fact, it is not mandatory as to the repayment of any of these funds. No doubt there will be a replenishment of at least a portion, but the funds provided in the original bill may be used for any of the purposes outlined in the amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do I understand the $50,000,000 is an additional amount over and above the $200,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes; in the authorization.

Mr. BOILEAU. So that the total amount of the bill is $250,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is what I understood.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE SITE, SAN ANTONIO, TEX.—REREERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to transfer consideration of the bill (H.R. 8514) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey a part of the post-office site in San Antonio, Tex., to the city of San Antonio, Tex., for street purposes, in exchange for land for the benefit of the Government property, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The chairman of each of these respective committees has agreed to this re-reference and requested that I ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to refer the bill H.R. 8514 from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

USE OF EQUIPMENT, ETC., FOR AIR MAIL

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the conference report on the bill H.R. 7966, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department, for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 3.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "pension at the rate prescribed in part 1, Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), and amendments thereto: Provided, That in the event of injury of any such officer or enlisted man the degree of disability resulting therefrom shall be determined pursuant to the rating schedule authorized by Veterans' Regulation No. 3 (a): Provided further, That choice shall be made of the benefits provided in sections 4 and 5 of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and use equipment, landing fields, men, and material of the War Department, for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon:

On amendment no. 1: Provides that airplanes placed at the disposal of the Postmaster General by the Secretary of War for the transportation of the mail by air shall be fully equipped for safe night and day flying, and that pilots assigned to such airplanes shall be fully and adequately trained in the use of such special equipment.

On amendment no. 2: The amendment added by the Senate to section 4 of the bill did not change the intent of the proposal made by the House but merely clarified the meaning, that the pensions prescribed therein were to be determined pursuant to the rating schedule authorized by veterans' regulation no. 3 (a). The proviso added to section 4 by the conferees eliminates the possibility of interpreting the act to provide for the payment of pension benefits as provided by section 4 and the benefits provided by section 5 to the same person.

On amendment no. 3: This amendment directs the Postmaster General to make a report to the Congress of every payment made by him under this act, including the cost of transporting the mail by the War Department, on the first day of the next session of the Congress.

M. A. ROMJUE,
W. F. BRUNNER,
HARRY L. HAINES,
CLYDE KELLY,
FRANK H. FOSS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that, will he yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman explain the change in the language that is contained in the conference report, in lieu of the matter inserted?

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman refer to amendment no. 2?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. After the bill had passed the House it went to the Senate, and there seemed to be a conflict in the two sections, 4 and 5, as passed in the Senate. The conferees got together and an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOSS] is familiar with the matter as is every member of the conference. We unanimously agreed that that was the best way to proceed in the matter; afterward the report went back to the Senate, and the conference report was adopted. The Senate has approved the conference report. Sections 4 and 5 were not quite clear as to the possibility of whether or not a man might not claim under both sections at the same time. Of course, the Senate conferees indicated that that was not the intention, but still it was not clear.

Mr. SNELL. Then this really is an amendment to straighten out the meaning of sections 4 and 5?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And it is clear now so that everybody can understand it?

Mr. ROMJUE. That is what we think.

Mr. SNELL. Very well.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ELECTRIFICATION OF STEAM RAILROADS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2950) to authorize steam railroads to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it necessary to ask unanimous consent to call up a District of Columbia bill today?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised it is not.

Mr. SNELL. Have any of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia had notice that this bill was going to be called up today?

Mr. PALMISANO. Today is District day?

Mr. SNELL. But it was understood we would go on with the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. I understand that unanimous consent is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary.

Mr. SNELL. I think we ought to have notice of this kind of legislation when it is coming up.

Mr. BYRNS. But this is District day.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that, but it was understood that we were to go along with the debate on the tariff bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know of any such understanding made on the floor of the House. This is District day, and I take it that any legislation which has been recommended is in order.

Mr. SNELL. The chairman of the committee asked to meet at 11 o'clock today so that we could go along with the debate on the tariff bill. That is the understanding I had. I do not know that there is any objection to this bill, but I think the Members should be notified when you are going to bring up matters of this character.

Mr. PALMISANO. I may say, if the gentleman will allow me to explain the bill, that I do not believe there will be any objection to the bill. This is a Senate bill. The District Committee reported favorably a similar bill in the House. It is to give a permit to the Pennsylvania Railroad in order that they may be able to electrify their line from New York to the District of Columbia. As I understand now, they are unable to obtain a permit in the District of Columbia under the law. This simply gives them that right. It means that a great number of men will be employed.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is the principle that I am objecting to. I am not going to object to this bill, because I think I am for it, probably; but I think we should be notified what the program is going to be each day. If we are going to take up District of Columbia bills when it was the general understanding of the House that we would go along with the debate on the tariff bill, I think we are entitled to know.

Mr. BYRNS. The rules of the House provide for 2 days each month for the consideration of District of Columbia legislation. Whenever District bills are reported, and on the calendar, with a favorable report from the committee, it seems to me the members of that committee ought to know that when District day arrives those bills may be called up.

Mr. SNELL. But we have never obeyed that rule, and the understanding was that we were to meet at 11 o'clock so that we could go on with the debate on the tariff bill. I am not going to object to this bill, but I am making a general objection to calling up matters like this in advance.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That steam-railroad companies now operating within the District of Columbia are hereby authorized, after approval of their detailed plans and issuance of a permit by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia and across the Anacostia and Potomac Rivers with an alternating current overhead catenary or other type of electrification system, with all necessary transmission, signal, and communication conductors and equipment, poles, conduits, underground and overhead construction, substations, and any other structures necessary in such electrification, the provisions of any law or laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. Submarine cables may be used at drawbridge openings, provided previous approval shall have been obtained from the War Department.

Sec. 3. Where necessary for such electrification, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may issue permits to construct conduit systems through or under the surfaces of public streets or other District of Columbia or United States property: Provided, however, That three ducts therein shall be reserved for the use of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Sec. 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or abridging the authority of the War Department, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Sec. 5. The said railroad companies shall be liable for any accident to, or injuries sustained by, any person by reason of any act or omission of the railroad companies or by their agents or servants during the construction, installation, maintenance, or operation of the electrical equipment and apparatus of the railroad trains.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if this bill was submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission before action was taken on it by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not believe there has been a report from the Interstate Commerce Commission, but, as I understand, it is a local matter. The Pennsylvania Railroad has set up the poles and wires to the line of the District of Columbia. They are now unable to proceed unless they obtain a permit from the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAPES. Did the Committee on the District of Columbia hold hearings on the bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. Well, the committee passed on it. The committee reported favorably on the bill. I cannot say whether hearings were held or not.

Mr. MAPES. Did the District Committee hold hearings?

Mr. PALMISANO. The bill passed the Senate, and I understand hearings were held there. There was no hearing in the House committee, except that we took the matter up in the regular way, and there seemed to be no objection.

Mr. MAPES. I have not read the bill, but I notice in the reading of it by the Clerk there is a provision requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to take some action in connection with this electrification. It seems to me it is a matter of such importance that it ought to be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission before the House acts upon it.

Mr. PALMISANO. As I understand, there has not been any objection anywhere.

Mr. MAPES. It provides for underground cables; it provides for other things, and it is a matter of importance, I think, the gentleman will concede. For all I know it is all right, but it ought to be passed upon by some responsible agency of the Government, and it seems to me it should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission before we act upon it blindly here.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Press reports state that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has loaned $60,000,000 to the Pennsylvania Railroad—and I am confirmed in that recollection by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN]—for the purpose of doing this work. I take it that it is thoroughly agreeable with the Interstate Commerce Commission, since the Government has allocated that amount of money for the purpose of doing this work.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. BYRNS. The bill has already passed the Senate, and has been recommended by the House committee.

Mr. MAPES. It may be that the assumption of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is correct. It may have been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not know. My point is that before acting upon an important measure of this kind, the House should have before it something more than an assumption that it has been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We should have a definite report from the Interstate Commerce Commission before acting upon it.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman, of course, knows that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would not have taken the step of loaning that immense amount of money without entire approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, that being so, and the Senate having passed this bill, and the House committee having favorably recommended it, it seems to me, since it involves simply the question of a permit to enable this railroad to proceed with the work of electrifying its lines between Washington and New York City, that this bill should be passed. The gentleman from Maryland has stated that without this permit the railroad will be unable to proceed and to put these men to work.

Mr. MAPES. My position, Mr. Speaker, is simply this: I assume this is a perfectly good bill, but from hearing it read it occurs to me that there are several important affirmative provisions in it, and it should not be passed by the House without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This approval can be obtained without any difficulty. For myself, I would not want to take the responsibility of acting upon it without the affirmative approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Has not the Interstate Commerce Commission already approved the electrification and the work being done by the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is bound to have approved it, for the railroad has borrowed the money for this purpose from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. MAPES. I do not know whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has approved this bill. Reference is made in the bill to underground cables and other important matters. It is not a very difficult thing to secure the approval of the Commission if the project meets with its approval; and it is my belief that we should have knowledge of the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission before we act upon the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I might say to the gentleman from Michigan that the Interstate Commerce Commission did approve the loan which is being made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to carry out the work.

Mr. BYRNS. I think that is sufficient answer to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. PALMISANO. This bill only permits the District Commissioners to grant a license to do the very thing that is stated in the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman again read the reference in the bill to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is section 4 of the bill. It reads as follows:

Sec. 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or abridging the authority of the War Department, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is nothing in this bill that would limit their rights.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill merely permits them to exercise in the District of Columbia those rights that they exercise everywhere else between here and New York in the electrification of this railroad. It gives them no additional franchise of any kind. I think the bill is all right.

Mr. MAPES. It provides for the laying of certain underground cables.

Mr. BLANTON. That is absolutely necessary. The Commissioners still have control of all these matters, for the bill itself retains jurisdiction and control in the Commissioners and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very easy matter to have this bill passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I dislike to object, but—

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is too late to object. This is District day, and it is in order to call the bill up for consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill is called up as a matter of right.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully as the bill was called up and watched the proceedings with that point in mind. After the colloquy with the gentleman from New York, the Republican leader, nothing was said except that the Clerk would report the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But this is District of Columbia day, and the District of Columbia Committee has a right to be recognized to call a District of Columbia bill up as a matter of right.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Why should the Interstate Commerce Commission pass upon a matter that deals solely with the District of Columbia? This bill simply extends power to the District Commissioners to take care of a local situation. It is not a matter for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Because it pertains to a railroad and should have the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman believe that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would approve a loan of $60,000,000 to this railroad unless the Interstate Commerce Commission had passed upon it?

Mr. MAPES. I do not think we are acting with a due sense of responsibility if we pass this bill without the approval of the Commission.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman, merely upon that sort of an objection, wish to delay this opportunity for employment another 2 weeks—merely because the gentleman thinks this ought to be again submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MAPES. When the gentleman says "again submitted", is he speaking accurately? I have been trying to find out if it has been submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission at all.

Mr. BYRNS. It was not submitted by the House committee, but I assume it was by the Senate committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I asked the Chair whether unanimous consent was necessary to call up this bill and the Chair ruled that it was not necessary.

The SPEAKER. That was the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to be technical in this. If the gentleman from Maryland wishes to move that the House consider this legislation, of course, I cannot object to that, but I do object to taking it up by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar.

Mr. MAPES. But no effort has been made to call it up except by unanimous consent, and unanimous consent has not yet been given.

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day, and the Acting Chairman of the District Committee, by direction of that committee, may call this bill up as a matter of right. The Chair will say that a similar House bill was favorably reported by the District Committee and placed on the House Calendar before the Senate bill came over. Under rule XXIV, clause 2, the Committee on the District of Columbia could dispose of this bill under the provisions of clause 1 of the same rule or the committee could dispose of it under clause 8 of that rule.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House consider the bill (S. 2950) to authorize steam railroads to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the motion or the statement of the Speaker. May I ask what the status of the bill is at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is before the House for consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is before the House under the rules of the House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk again read the Senate bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

BUILDING-AND-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (S. 2089) to amend the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, title 5, ch. 3), relating to building-and-loan associations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of the District of Columbia (31 Stat. 1300; D.C. Code, title 5, ch. 3) is amended by adding at the end of title 5, chapter 3, thereof, the following new sections:

"Sec. 55. Personal property: The board of directors of any building association incorporated or unincorporated, organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, to do or now doing, in the District of Columbia, a building-association business, in their discretion, may purchase the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation created pursuant to the authority of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, approved June 13, 1933 (and said association is hereby permitted to carry said bonds as an asset at the par value of said bonds) or may subscribe and pay for shares of any Federal corporation created or authorized by law to lend money to building-and-loan associations.

"Sec. 56. Any building association incorporated or unincorporated, organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, to do or now doing, in the District of Columbia, a building-association business, is authorized and empowered to exchange mortgages or deeds of trust or the notes or bonds secured thereby or other obligations and liens secured on real estate or any real estate, which it may have or hold, for the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation created pursuant to the authority of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, approved June 13, 1933, and said association is hereby authorized to carry said bonds as an asset at the par value of said bonds."

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, regardless of the attitude toward this proposed legislation, everybody must recognize it as a very important item of proposed legislation. Some question has been raised as to the constitutionality of this proposed legislation. I lay no claim to being a constitutional lawyer, but I think I know as much about the Constitution as some constitutional lawyers. If I were able to do it, there are two or three things I should like to do. I should like to take the strut out of statesmanship, and I should like to bring the Constitution within the comprehension of the average person in America.

Those of us who are lawyers and those of us who claim to be statesmen are a great deal like doctors; we are somewhat opposed to using terms that folks can understand. I sometimes think if we statesmen were to pursue the methods of the chemist, or rather, if the chemist were to pursue the policy of ours, if he were asked to ascertain the composition of some representative samples taken from a mountain, instead of analyzing the samples he would analyze the mountain out of which the samples came and go through a process of high-sounding reasoning and deduction as to what is the probable contents of the samples.

Now, as a matter of fact, there is not anything very difficult of understanding about the constitutionality of this bill. It is a plain question of whether or not Congress has the power to delegate to the President the responsibility contained in the bill, and this is not a new question in America. From the beginning of the Government, Congress has found it necessary to make delegations of power to the Chief Executive similar to, though not as extensive as, those proposed by this bill. The principle is identical. The degree is different, but principle and not degree is the test which determines constitutional power.

During Washington's first administration the Congress gave to the Chief Executive the power to levy a prohibition against the ships of foreign countries if, in the judgment of the Executive, this was necessary in order properly to protect the public interest. There was a long series of legislation of this sort. The constitutionality was tested first in the Supreme Court and determined in the opinion cited in 7 Cranch., known as the "Brig Aurora."

I shall not take time to discuss this decision, because it is referred to in One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports, which is perhaps the leading case. This is the case of Field against Clark. This matter reached the Supreme Court when it was required to construe Federal statutes which, while levying a tax upon sugar, leather, tea, and other articles, provided, in substance, that the President might suspend these tariff rates in the event he could make a favorable trade with foreign nations.

You will observe the discretion that was lodged in the President in this case. The President's discretion was as broad as the field of American commerce. It is true he was given a limited number of articles with which he could trade with foreign countries, but the principle and power are the same as though he had been given the entire list of commodities.

This power of Congress to so empower the President was tested in this case, Field against Clark. The question was raised that section 3 of said act was unconstitutional and void in that it delegated to the President the power to legislate, the power to deal with import duties, which power, by section 1 of article VIII of the Constitution, is vested in the Congress.

In this opinion the Court reviewed the former acts of Congress from Washington's administration down, to which I have referred, approved them and held that in the acts under challenge there was no unconstitutional attempt to delegate powers to the President. I will call your attention to section 3 of the act under examination in that case. This reading is perhaps not very interesting. I appreciate the attention that the Members of Congress are giving to this rather dry statement of a very important matter.

This is section 3 of the act to which I have referred:

With a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles and for this purpose on and after the 1st day of January 1892, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any other such article, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States—

And so forth.

In the event the President became convinced of these facts and then became convinced of the opportunity of making a good bargain—this is the plain common-sense translation of the language—the President was authorized to make a trade agreement and in making that trade to modify an existing rate.

The Court here refers to the decision in the case of the brig Aurora (7 Cr.), to which I have referred, and approved that decision. I am proceeding as rapidly as I can because I do not want to take too much of your time.

Among the declarations of the Court in this opinion is this one:

If we find the Congress has frequently, from the organization of the Government to the present time, conferred upon the President powers with reference to trade and commerce like those conferred by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, the fact is entitled to great weight in determining the question before us.

Which was a question of constitutionality.

This pronouncement of the Court is important because of the fact that since the beginning of the Government powers similar to that sought to be conferred by the bill now under consideration were conferred by the Congress upon the Chief Executive. The Supreme Court pronounced the rule of construction in this case, of Field versus Clark, which is the present rule of construction, that long-continued governmental practice is to be given great consideration.

Now, you will recall the language contained in the act, construed in the One Hundred and Forty-third United States, referred to—

That at any time after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient—

And so forth.

You have heard a good deal in the argument with reference to the unconstitutionality of this bill that it does not put up a definite yardstick. There can be no broader yardstick than that contained in the act approved by the Supreme Court, in which it held that a delegation to the discretion of the President by the Congress to act whenever he, the President, should deem it expedient, when he examined the facts and matured a judgment he should put into operation powers conferred upon him by the Congress if he deemed it expedient.

I continue to quote from Field versus Clark:

While some of these precedents are stronger—

The Court is referring now to the legislative precedents to which I have referred—than others in their application to the case before us, they all show that in the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government—

Now, pay particular attention to this, if you please—

It is often desirable, if not essential, for the protection of the interests of our people against the unfriendly and discriminating regulations established by foreign governments, in the interests of their people, to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce with other nations * * * as given by so many acts of Congress and embracing almost the entire period of our national existence should not be overruled, unless upon a conviction that such legislation was clearly incompatible with the supreme law of the land.

And, again, the Court holds in this case—and I am referring extensively to this decision, because it clearly is the leading case in the United States, establishing the power of the Congress to make this character of delegation of authority to the President which is embodied in the bill under consideration. The first of these acts to which the Court refers was that of June 1, 1794, and was during Washington's first administration.

He was given power to lift certain restrictions on international commerce and to reestablish them whenever in his opinion—not the opinion of Congress—the public safety required. If not in this act the power to reestablish was given, it certainly was given by a subsequent act, the one construed in Seventh Cranch referred to.

This is interesting in view of the fact that while it is held that Congress cannot delegate to the President legislative power, it is also held that the delegation of this sort of power, the sort proposed by this bill to be delegated, is not a legislative power or authority.

With your permission, I am going to move across a considerable period of time in our governmental history and direct your attention now to a comparatively recent case—the case of Hampton & Co. against the United States, reported in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Taft.

I think this is the only other authority to which I shall refer, although I have a memorandum of others.

This case arose under the flexible-tariff provision of the tariffs acts, with which you are all familiar. The contention was made in that case that Congress had no constitutional authority to make that delegation to the Chief Executive. In other words, it was attacked as an attempt to delegate to the Chief Executive the power to make a law.

The Court passed squarely on that question and held in that case, in that situation Congress had not delegated legislative power to the President. The Court recognized, of course, the great power that had been delegated to the President, but held it was within constitutional warrant.

Chief Justice Taft, in the rendition of this opinion, likened the power exercised by the President under the flexible provision to the power exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is like that power. These powers come from the same source, and their delegation is subject to identically the same constitutional limitations. When you contemplate the powers exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the delegation by the Congress, you may quite appreciate within what scope the powers of Congress can be delegated to the Chief Executive under the provisions of the Constitution dealing with the revenue.

This opinion, if you will take occasion to examine it, if you have the interest to do it, you will find that it and the opinion which I cited in the One Hundred and Forty-third United States cover the whole field. In other words, it is not at all necessary to make an examination of any other authority in order to understand exactly what is the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to this sort of legislation.

Perhaps it would be worth while for me to take a little time to call attention to section 315—I believe that is the act of 1922—

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Section 315 corresponds to section 350.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Section 315 provides:

That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in costs of production of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country, he shall, by said investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act shown by said ascertained differences in such costs of production necessary to equalize the same.

Here is something that possibly a good many have overlooked. I had until I made this examination. In section (c) of this act it is provided that in ascertaining the difference between the cost of production under the previous subdivisions, (a) and (b) of this section, the President, insofar as he finds it practicable, shall take into consideration the difference in conditions in production, including wage, cost of material, and other items, in the cost of production of such articles in the United States and in competing territory. Then follows 2 and 3 and 4, and 4 is a very interesting provision. It is as follows:

Any other advantage or disadvantage in competition.

Therefore, we have a law on the statute books now which authorizes the President of the United States in modifying the rate fixed by the Congress up or down 50 percent to take into consideration what we know as the cost-of-production difference, and then any other advantage or disadvantage in competition. That is as broad as the earth. It is difficult to conceive of any motive or reason or justification that a President would like to have actuate him in changing tariff rates which he wants to change that could not be covered in under that language.

I want now to refer you to the language of Chief Justice Taft, already referred to, in which he declared that the same principal which permits Congress to delegate power to fix railroad rates authorizes Congress to delegate power to fix custom rates.

This is what the Court held:

The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with this provision the fixing of such rates justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise.

After one reads that declaration by the Supreme Court and calls to mind the wide range of discretion exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States in fixing rates, any lingering doubt as to the constitutionality of this bill disappears. I have not tried to make a constitutional argument of the orthodox sort. I hope I may have been of some assistance even to those who do not agree with my conclusions.

I am going to yield now for a few minutes to any inquiries that Members may desire to put to me. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Seven minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am going to ask the chairman for just a few minutes more in order that I may yield for a few questions.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I should be glad to yield to any questions. This House is a very interesting body to me. I have found that most people who ask questions in this House want some information. Of course, occasionally someone will ask a question to trip one up, but that is all right.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I have been trying to follow the argument of the gentleman, and from what I have heard I have the idea that the sum and substance of the holding in the case in the One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports and the subsequent case by Chief Justice Taft is that the Congress does not delegate to the President legislative authority, but mere power to deal with the legislation submitted to him, and leaves entirely to the President the exercise of discretion as to the time, the necessity, and the methods of applying the legislation to the particular questions which he has to consider, and that it is not in fact a delegation of legislative authority, but merely a delegation of power to deal with legislation that has already been enacted.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is what the courts hold with regard to the powers which have heretofore been delegated by the Congress to the President. That is what the courts have held with regard to the extraordinary powers that have been delegated by Congress to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and there are some other decisions, a number of them, dealing with the constitutionality of the delegation of power which Congress has delegated to various other agencies of the Government which exercise discretion. In this particular case, to translate the language of this bill into simple language, it is this: If enacted, it would carry with it a declaration on the part of Congress that the job of rehabilitating this country has not been completed. It seems to me to indicate a judgment on the part of Congress that one of the chief difficulties of ours, or the chief diseases, lies in our economic circulatory system. I like to use that expression because a long time ago I coined the phrase, and I never have been able to get anybody to repeat it. We have about all the things we need in this country and in the world, plenty of everything, but they do not circulate. We have just as definite an economic circulatory system as a doctor can find in the human body. We have an economic circulatory system in the world of which we are a part. No man lives unto himself and no nation can live unto itself.

We are a part of the business of the world. We are a part of the economic body of the world. This bill recognizes that we are in an unusual situation. Possibly the Congress would not be willing to express a judgment as to what ought to be done and project that judgment into the period between this Congress and the next Congress, because things are too much in a state of flux. That is one reason why this bill is proposed.

Now, by this bill what you propose to do is to say to the President of the United States, "We are concerned to see normal economic circulation revived in this country and revived in the world, and we give you authority to do what you can to help in that regard, taking care of the interest of our people. You are authorized to move to the right or the left, up or down, and if you find that movement in either of those directions carry you into greater difficulty, carries you not to the goal, then you can change your direction, and change before too great harm may be done to our hope and to the world's hope of recovery. While we must preserve our unrivaled nationalism and guard our economic independence, insofar as it exists, it would seem an impossible thing for us to reach a happy, secure, economic stability in which the other nations have no part.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] 10 additional minutes.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I have read the decision to which the gentleman has referred and note carefully that the Court holds that this delegation of taxing power is not a delegation of the power. For instance, if the President raises a tariff duty 50 percent, as he is authorized to do under the law, the Court holds that he is not levying a tax on the people. That is what I understand to be the holding of the Court.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not think that is the holding.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I think that is exactly what it holds. I think it is, and I want to know the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not he is levying a tax if he raises the duty to 50 percent, because taxing is the power of Congress and not the power of anybody else.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Possibly the gentleman is right.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I should like to ask the distinguished jurist—

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is not I.

Mr. MOTT. I think it is. I should like to ask the distinguished jurist if he does not think there is a fundamental difference between Congress setting up a commission like the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the purpose of regulating domestic utilities by fixing rates, and Congress delegating to the Executive legislative authority to make tariffs?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; there would be a difference if the gentleman's premise were sound.

Mr. MOTT. I understood the gentleman to draw a parallel between those two actions of Congress, and to say that they were similar.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Perhaps I can state my view on what I believe is part of that which is in the gentleman's mind. When Congress delegates power to the President it does not thereby delegate power to the Chief Executive as such. It delegates power to an individual who is defined and located by the description of the office which he holds.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman please, I did not say the executive department. I said "Executive", and by that I meant the President.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. I may have involved myself in trying to be clear. The delegation of power to the President, insofar as its constitutionality is concerned, is the same as the delegation of power to any other person, not the President.

Mr. MOTT. I can see that distinction; but is not the power delegated an entirely different kind of power? Is not the power delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate domestic utilities by fixing rates entirely different than the power which this bill proposes to delegate to the President, to exercise a function formerly exercised by Congress?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to my friend that the power of Congress to regulate rates in interstate commerce is identically the same sort of power which the Congress holds under the Constitution to regulate import duties. That is what I am trying to say. So a delegation to an agency to deal with one, insofar as constitutional questions are concerned, seems to me to be identical with the delegation of power to deal with the other. I am afraid that is as clear as I can make it. That is my view, and that is the best I can do about it.

Mr. MOTT. That is clear. But does not the gentleman think there is a difference between the power impliedly in Congress to regulate domestic utilities by fixing a rate, and the specific power of making tariffs, which is given to the Congress by the Constitution?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; not insofar as the nature of the power or insofar as the ability to Congress to delegate is concerned. That is the best I can do about it. I may be wrong, of course. I think not.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I wish the gentleman knew how much I appreciated his opinion, and he would then know why I am asking this question. In the Hampton case, Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports, the question before the Court was one in which the Tariff Commission had indeed found, and had indeed told, the President what it regarded as the difference in cost of production. Is that a correct statement of the case?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I assume that is correct; yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Now, if that is true, then insofar as the Court discussed any other proposition in the case, as, for example, the general omnibus provisions of the act whereby the President could change tariffs for any other reason, that discussion would not be appropriate to the real decision if the facts were such as were based on the difference in cost of production.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think the gentleman is largely correct in his conclusion. I do believe, however, in reading this case, that the Chief Justice anticipated questions that might arise, and did intend to pronounce the judgment of the Supreme Court not only with regard to this matter but with regard to the closely associated collateral matters which he might expect to come.

For instance, the declaration of the Court in this case with regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission in a very definite sense is obiter, but that pronouncement was so related to the thing decided and is so obviously sound that it may be given full credit as a definite determination by the court of last resort of the fact of law embodied in the words which I have quoted.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am simply pointing out that those things are not really within the case so far as the decision itself is concerned.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have followed the gentleman's discussion very closely. From what I understood him to say, he considers this law as a continuation of the policy laid down in the flexible clause of the present tariff act.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is an extension of the same power.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If it is an extension of the flexible provision, how can the gentleman square his vote against the flexible provision 2 years ago with his present advocacy of this power?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Of course the gentleman is not asking me a question that deals with the constitutionality of this bill, the thing at the moment being considered; but I will answer him.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I think the gentleman would not vote for anything that was not constitutional.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I voted against it before. The gentleman would not want to hold me to vote for everything just because it was constitutional.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not think the gentleman would vote for any bill that was not constitutional.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I voted against it before, whatever you may want to make of that.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I want to read the gentleman three short paragraphs and ask him a question at the conclusion. This is from a statement made on the floor of the House February 13, 1932, by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]:

There is a tendency in this country manifested when we come to write a tariff bill to surrender the powers which Nature says belong to the representative branch.

They are being surrendered to the Executive. That is the truth of it; and we are accumulating about the President of the United States powers so great that no human being in human history has been able, and no human being ever will be able, to possess without their abusive exercise. I mean God Almighty has put that limitation upon human capacity.

When we come to deal with our powers and responsibilities, gentlemen of the Congress, let us not try to hide ourselves and protect ourselves against the people through the shifting of powers to the Executive—powers which belong to us.

Does the gentleman still feel that way?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think the statements of Mr. SUMNERS on the floor under the circumstances under which they were uttered were very wise statements. [Laughter.] And if anybody believes that I believe in these concentrations of Federal power as a permanent policy of government or as a policy under normal conditions, he is very much mistaken. I not only do not like these concentrations of power in the Federal Government but I do not like the concentration of power in the executive branch of the Government.

As I view this situation and as I have tried to state it several times on the floor of the House, we are not privileged now to deal with the economic conditions of this country safely. We passed that day and that opportunity while you were saying everything will be all right around the corner. Great difficulties were challenging us to meet the situation, but you were going along saying, "Everything will be all right—just around the corner."

I stated on the floor of the House during the last administration and tried to point out to my colleagues that we were headed for the rocks. The only response I got was "No, no." Now, we do not have the privilege of proceeding safely any more than a nation at war has the privilege of proceeding safely. We are engaged in the greatest economic war that ever challenged the genius of the statesmanship and of the people of any age or generation; and now we are paying the penalty and the House is having to do dangerous things in order to save our very economic existence. If during the 12 years that preceded this administration—and I am not speaking only of the Republicans, I am speaking of the American people. I tried in my small way to rouse this Congress to a consciousness of its danger. I went to my own people and told them we were headed for the rocks; and nobody would listen. The man in the White House then, Mr. Hoover, I do not hold entirely responsible; it was the responsibility of the American people. The point I am trying to bring home to you gentlemen on the Republican side is that you fiddled while Rome was catching fire. Now we have got to try to put out the flames. I do not place all the responsibility on that side. I want that understood, for the gentleman has quoted what I said some years ago. What I said then was right, and sound under normal conditions.

A good many people seem to feel that we have about reached the shore and they are beginning to rock the boat. Every Republican voted against this bill in the committee; every Democrat voted for it in the committee. That is a dangerous sign. Over all this country we see people, it seems to me, who just a year ago were crying out for salvation, willing to do anything; now, when the President is trying to bring the ship to shore, the ship which has the whole United States aboard, they have forgotten their danger, having had a little taste of profits and dividends, and are rocking the boat.

If I am quoted on this next statement I hope the statement will be balanced up. Laboring men who have not had a job for 2 years and who now have a little taste of employment are looking around for an excuse to strike. Republicans who have been going along with the administration, standing shoulder to shoulder with the administration, are now playing for political advantage. Over on the Democratic side we are rowing about this thing, that thing, and the other thing. I am not criticizing you. The election is mighty close. If our situations were changed around I guess we would be doing the same thing. I am not putting on airs or assuming any "holier than thou" attitude, but may I say to the Democratic side and to the Republican side, and I hope I will not appear presumptuous, and to the great captains of industry and finance and to the laboring men, and to the people as a whole, that we have not reached the shore. We are in the middle of the stream, and we are living on borrowed money. This thing which a lot of people are mistaking for normal prosperity is the result of a shot in the arm and we have been borrowing the money to buy the dope.

I want to tell you right now, and I say to the American people today, that this Nation is on the brink yet. Of course, we all get irritated at some of these generals and professors telling the American people what to do, but I imagine they are worn to a frazzle. I imagine they are worn out. The point is when you rock the boat the other fellow is in you rock the boat you are in. We are all in the same boat. That is what I am trying to say. [Applause.]

May I tell you right now that this is no time to try to play any funny stuff. If there ever was a time in the history of the Nation when conditions challenged us to forget our personal interests and to put our hands to the oar and devote ourselves to trying to reach shore, it is this minute.

I am uneasy about the rows and controversies developing all over the United States. I do not think Mr. Roosevelt is other than a mortal. He makes mistakes. But there is a man who is giving his life in an effort to save his people. He is entitled to the confidence and support of everyone who has any concern for their own self-interests. He has not had a chance to do this thing properly. I do not like to see all these professors brought in. Professors are mighty good to instruct and advise, but they are mighty poor to direct and determine. They are all right in their job, but this is not their job. But they were about all he could get, because the truth is that most of us statesmen have been looking no further into the mysteries of statecraft, not much further, than the next election.

The President hoped to have a little time to orient himself before he had to tackle the job, but you will remember that the music of the bands that celebrated his inauguration was marred by the crashing of banks all over the Nation the very day of the celebration. When the responsibilities came he did not have a minute. The banks, the railroads, the life-insurance companies, the whole economic structure, was tottering and about to fall.

Up to this time in the main he has been trying to do two things. He has been trying to prevent that structure from falling, and at the same time keeping millions of idle people from starving. But the real work of construction and reconstruction in the main is yet to be done. The Democrats and the Republicans deep down under the skin are the same sort of people. I do not claim for the right-hand side of this Chamber one thing that I do not yield to the men and women on the left-hand side of this Chamber. I have never seen the time since I have been here when we were faced with a real crisis, and the men on the Republican side realized that the crisis was at hand, that they did not rise to as high a level of statesmanship as anybody on the Democratic side. At this time I am trying to speak to my people. You are not Democrats or Republicans in the hour of your Nation's danger. You are the representatives of a people who are looking to you in this hour of great peril. We are operating under a war psychology.

As I have tried to say two or three times, it is a very interesting fact that the Anglo-Saxon people, our people, who have operated a parliamentary system of government for over a thousand years, have developed certain governmental instincts. One of the governmental instincts which Anglo-Saxon people have developed is to scent the existence of a crisis that requires a quicker pick-up and a stronger power than the ordinary Anglo-Saxon institutions afford. Under such circumstances, en masse they turn from the ordinary operation of their governmental machines and concentrate governmental powers in their Executive. We have had the remarkable genius, however, of concentrating those powers and at the same time retaining the power to control their exercise and the power of recapture and redistribute them.

We are in one of those hours now. With all due respect, it is positively ridiculous for a man to stand on the floor of this House, when our country is at war with economic conditions and the whole nation is operating under a war psychology, and undertake to measure human conduct and legislative duty in this hour by the standards which the people observe under ordinary conditions. That is the answer to my friend, the distinguished gentleman who asked me with regard to what I said 2 years ago. I hope conditions will permit me to say that something less than 2 years from now I want these plans to be successful but not satisfactory. I believe in the people, in their ability, and in their right to govern themselves. No people can remain free who lose the capacity for self-government. That capacity can be preserved only by its exercise. If I did not believe that we could turn from this unsatisfactory condition and go back to a condition of local and individual responsibility, I would say let the crash come now. I would rather have liberty and distributed responsibility than a half cent more per pound for my pigs. [Applause.] We have been a foolish generation, a childish generation. We have gone head-on into this awful mess. We have got to stand together or we fall separately.

The first thing to do now is to get shoulder to shoulder and work together. We are all in the same boat. I think you Republicans will pick up a good many votes, anyhow, next time. If we could get some like BERT SNELL and quite a lot of others over there I would not mind it so much. Of course, I would hate to give up any of the boys on this side, but in your desire to get votes do not rock the boat. The swimming will be just as hard for BERT SNELL and his crowd if you turn the boat over as it is going to be for the boys on this side and for our people.

There are some dangerous indications abroad in the land. I do not like this sort of legislation any more than you do. But the big job is to restore trade, to revive commodity circularization.

We have permitted whatever opportunity we had to proceed in the ordinary way to go by.

Quick action, ability quickly to back up if hurtful results begin to be manifest—these are demanded by the difficulties in which we are involved. That is why we have now to give these powers to the President.

I cannot just exactly tell you where I started and I am certainly not sure where I have arrived, but I know my time is out, and I thank you very much for the privilege of talking with you. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 8687 is a bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. Its purpose is the promotion of foreign trade. The surplus products of farm and factory should find a market in all foreign lands. Depression unparalleled in our history invites an earnest effort to restore prosperity to our common country. Unemployment is abroad in the land. A united appeal from the masses for relief should spur Congress to action. In response to this demand this bill is proposed and presented to Congress by the Ways and Means Committee at the instance of President Roosevelt, and its early passage urged upon this body. Confidence in the President is invited.

Trade and commerce are a necessity to the prosperity of nations and those nations in all ages that have encouraged commerce have grown in wealth and power. Note the life and history of Rome, Spain, Great Britain, and Japan. Ancient Rome became great and powerful through the extension of her trade and commerce with all nations and the Roman Empire dominated the known world. When she lost her world trade and commerce, her power and wealth were gone and isolation became her heritage. When Spain lost her foreign trade and her colonies to other countries, this once proud nation of extensive commerce dropped to a third-rate power, and might now be classed as a self-contained nation living within its own borders a life of isolation, her world influence largely gone. The power and wealth and influence of Great Britain is due to her trade and commerce with all the peoples of all climes and her trading vessels plow the waves of all seas, her commerce extends over all lands and the sun never ceases to shine upon her British colonies and possessions. Whenever she loses her trade and commerce, isolation will be her heritage and her power as a great nation of world-wide influence will have ended. Japan, uncivilized, lived in darkness and ignorance of the outside world until a great American steered his United States vessel into the harbor of Japan and there opened its eyes to the fact that there was an outside world with which it could trade. Today Japan is no longer a nation of isolation, but ranks as a first-class nation, conscious of its strength and power, seeking commerce and trade with all nations.

Many nations have tried by force to extend their trade and commerce to increase their wealth and to secure prosperity and to avoid the isolation, that brings decay. The great cities of the United States owe their large populations and accumulated wealth to the fact that they are located on the borders of the oceans and on great lakes and rivers where they can enjoy more favorable commerce.

This proposed bill follows the Democratic platform at Chicago in 1932, upon which the Democratic Party went to the country with its nominees and won a great victory at the polls in November 1932. The authority here sought to be given to the President to enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments by which our products of farm and factory can be sold in foreign markets is the same kind of authority given by other governments to their chief executives. Shall we sit idly by and refuse to give to our President by act of Congress the needed authority to increase our commerce and the larger export of our surplus products? To refuse would be to declare for the doctrine of isolation, which has darkened every nation in the past, that has built and maintained high walls of protection against trade with other nations. To maintain these high walls is to invite retaliation and reduce our exports to foreign markets. As other nations and governments have trusted their high executives with this authority, the same power should be given our President, who will safeguard the rights of the people of the United States and all its interests and industries. Let us not take too much counsel of our fears but rather have confidence and hope that our condition may be improved by an increased sale of our foreign products.

The weak countries in all ages are those that have darkened their lands by avoiding foreign trade, and the civilized and strong nations are those that have engaged in trade and commerce with other nations. You are invited by the minority not to have confidence in the President. I am told that the Republican minority is united in opposition to this bill. This is evidenced by the Republican minority report of the Ways and Means Committee in their apparent partisan opposition. Our Republican friends have little right to complain of our President, who has been generous to them in a largely nonpartisan administration. The doctrine of isolation that they advocate for our country and their party creed, which they proclaim in their opposition to this bill, will not avail them, nor restore them to power. They may forsake the doctrines proclaimed by their great leaders, James G. Blaine, William McKinley, and Theodore Roosevelt, and they may repudiate the recent utterances of Ogden L. Mills in his speech at Topeka, Kans., and they may now seek a new cry of isolation for their party creed, and call it America self-contained, but it will not avail them. The hope of the Nation will not rest on the desert of isolation. The argument against the constitutionality of this measure, in my judgment, will break down, answered so often by the Supreme Court in passing on somewhat similar provisions in prior tariff laws. I invite your attention to that part of the majority report, which, on pages 9, 10, and 11 of said report, so fully discusses this question.

The alarming decrease in our export trade calls for action to remedy this condition. We must increase our sales or lessen our production, lessen the employment of labor, lessen the return to prosperity from the deep depression into which our country was driven after 12 years of Republican rule. Trade and commerce with all nations has been the creed and doctrine upon which our country has grown great in wealth and prosperity. Let us not abandon that healthful policy that has enabled the United States to dispose of its surplus products to meet the needs of other countries.

Reciprocal tariff agreements have been long advocated in the past by prominent statesmen of the United States. This question comes to the front now, because of the break-down in world commerce, and while other nations are seeking, through trade agreements and tariff bargaining to increase their commerce, this country should be active in increasing her commerce with foreign nations at the earliest possible date, so that the United States, by proper agreements, may dispose of her surplus products of farm and factory wherever possible. To effectuate that purpose it seems necessary by appropriate legislation to grant to the Chief Executive the power to promote foreign trade by reasonable and mutual agreements that may be beneficial and helpful to the contracting countries. Friendly trade with all nations would not only tend to increase the wealth of the trading nations but should tend to produce friendship and cordial relations and lessen the chances of war and world disturbances, and at the same time lower the high-tariff walls that destroy trade and commerce; that tend to impoverish the nations that cannot dispose of their surplus products. Discriminatory tariff rates in retaliation by one country against another should be avoided in the interest of peace and commerce.

We cannot afford to stand still and invite decay by neglecting to act, where action is necessary, or else our foreign trade may entirely disappear. Other nations are seeking new fields of commerce with other countries, and we must act quickly, and we can only do so by Executive action, and secure beneficial trade agreements by which foreign nations will purchase our surplus products rather than seek other markets.

Let me here quote brief extracts from the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. The President in his message asking for this authority said:

World trade has declined with startling rapidity. Our exports in 1933 were but 52 percent of the 1929 volume and 32 percent of the 1929 value. Other governments are winning their share of international trade by negotiated reciprocal trade agreements. If American agriculture and industrial interests are to retain their deserved place in this trade the American Government must be in a position to bargain for that place by rapid and decisive negotiation. Legislation such as this is an essential step in the progress of national economic recovery.

Secretary of State Hull in his testimony before our committee quoted President McKinley, who said, "Commercial wars are unprofitable." He further stated:

The total exports of the United States fell from $5,157,000,000 in 1929 to $1,149,000,000 in 1933, while imports fell from $4,339,000,000 in 1929 to $1,122,000,000 in 1933.

He further said:

International commerce on a fair and mutually profitable basis is the greatest civilizer and peacemaker in the experience of the human race.

The whole purpose, of course, is to promote primarily our domestic prosperity—that is, the primary and paramount purpose. We must have a market for our surplus products. Secretary of Commerce Roper said:

The falling off of our foreign trade with other nations during the last 4 years has been among the major forces in paralyzing our economic system.

Mr. O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, appointed by a Republican President, said:

Whatever may be said about our tariff policy, as it applied during the last 150 years, we have reached the point now where under existing conditions, if we are to keep pace with the rest of the world, we must take action similar to the action they have taken with reference to negotiating trade agreements.

Assistant Secretary of State Sayres said:

The power which this bill would grant is not in any sense a drastic departure from the power which has been exercised many times before in the history of our country by the President of the United States within the confines of power delegated to him by Congress—it is of the same kind carried on for the promotion of commerce from the earliest days. The loss of foreign markets to farmers means a lessened production, decreased acreage, and no surplus from agriculture, means also a loss to industry and closed factories, a discharge of labor, and increased unemployment.

Let us not abandon our foreign trade without a trial through Executive power to extend our needed foreign markets. Let us not withdraw our freight vessels from the high seas and tie them up in harbors there to decay, because of the end of commerce with foreign countries. If any foreign trade agreement fails to bring helpful results, it can be quickly terminated under the terms of the last section (b) of this bill, which reads as follows:

Every foreign-trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

A failure to pass this bill will be taken and understood as a want of confidence in the President of the United States. Whom the people trust with great power, Representatives in Congress can well afford to trust with reasonable power to negotiate trade agreements to increase our foreign trade. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, no one who respects the constitutional limitations which insure the orderly operation of this Government can look upon this bill, with anything but amazement and dismay.

It is amazing that the party in power should be so lacking in the sense of responsibility as to make a proposal to demoralize the operations of government. It is shocking that this outrageous proposal is made in the name of economic equilibrium and recovery.

But amazement deepens into dismay when it is realized that the Democratic Party not only intends to perpetrate this outrage upon the Constitution, but possesses the power to accomplish its purpose temporarily. During the period between enactment of this measure and the inevitable judgment that will declare it null and void, the Government, industry, and individual citizens will suffer incalculable injury.

The first and most important power conferred upon Congress is the power to lay and collect taxes and duties. This is the power of life and death, not only over the Government, but over industry and individuals. The people conferred this power upon Congress and denied it to any other agent. Congress cannot divest itself of this power while the Constitution lives. It may try to do so, but its attempt will merely lead to damage, confusion, and failure.

I indict this bill as unconstitutional to the core, because it attempts to rob Congress of its power to lay and collect duties.

The most important power of this House is the exclusive power to originate bills for raising revenue. The people require this House to determine how and to what extent they shall be taxed.

The House cannot divest itself of this authority. Congress must control all the sources of revenue. Unless the House ascertains these sources and provides for the national finances, the Government cannot endure. It would be impossible to regulate the income and expenditures of the Government if any agency other than Congress should have power to raise revenue.

This bill attempts to violate the Constitution by depriving this House of the right to originate bills for raising revenue.

We all know that the American Union was established as a result of conflicts over commerce and the impossibility of regulating foreign commerce by the separate States. The power to regulate foreign commerce is vested in Congress by the Constitution. Next to the power to tax, the regulation of commerce is perhaps the most important authority conferred upon Congress.

Yet this bill proposes to take away from Congress its power to regulate commerce. If this bill becomes law, Congress will have abdicated its power. The President will become the lawmaking power in all that pertains to commercial relations with all foreign nations. He will not only have power to raise or lower duties but he will be empowered to impose import quotas and licenses, discriminate in exchange and clearing regulations, and set up restrictions requiring that imported goods shall contain a certain proportion of domestic produce. He can raise consular and other administrative fees. He can require goods to be marked in such manner as to restrict or increase imports from certain countries. He can impose sanitary regulations as a means of regulating commerce. He can discriminate between foreign nations, favoring some and antagonizing others.

It is idle to say that Congress will have power to regulate foreign commerce after it has granted to the President these unlimited powers. Congress will be unable to determine the sum total of revenue if the President is empowered to fix the rates of duty on imported goods. He will have control over the revenue to a great extent by controlling foreign commerce.

In another vital particular this bill attempts to violate the Constitution. It proposes to transfer the treaty-making power to the Executive. I oppose this attempt with all the force at my command, because it is a furtive effort to accomplish by indirect means the destruction of the power of Congress to lay and collect duties and of the power of this House to originate bills for raising revenue.

We are denied information regarding all of the ultimate objectives of this measure; just another measure the people must not know about until it is too late. Rumor has it we have agents in Europe making deals now. One is for free cement from Belgium. How will the cement manufacturers from the Atlantic seaboard like that? Another is free lumber from Russia. How will the Northwest like that? And there are many others, all of which means destruction of American industries. Spokesmen of the administration have admitted that one of the purposes of the measure is to destroy some of the industries of the United States. How many industries are to be destroyed is not disclosed, but apparently any industry which does not produce goods as cheaply as they can be obtained from foreign countries is marked for destruction.

The Secretary of Agriculture specifically mentioned the sugar-beet industry, the cane-sugar industry, the lace-making and fine textile industry, and the toy industry as scheduled for extinction. He described them as "inefficient", and announced that all inefficient industries must be destroyed, so that more efficient foreign industries may supply this market.

This process of destruction is to be merciful, according to Secretary Wallace. Industry is to be destroyed by slow torture instead of by a single deathblow. He said:

The procedure should be slow, should be careful, taking into account the fact, we will say, for instance, that here are certain workers who have spent their whole lifetime working in a factory of this type and, if there is a rapid loss in markets for the goods produced through that factory, an injustice might be done, and that fair warning should be given.

Thank the Lord he is even that much interested in American industry.

Although Secretary Wallace admits that 5,000,000 Americans are employed in what he describes as "inefficient industries", he would destroy those industries. I call your attention to this extract from the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means on March 8:

Mr. WALLACE. I can conceive of a situation where Germany, for instance, might be willing to lower the tariff on lard in case she could move, we will say, some toys into the United States.

Mr. REED. Well, would you favor lowering the tariffs on things Germany produces and ships to this country and which we produce here in our own country?

Mr. WALLACE. If Germany can produce them more efficiently than we can, it would be of benefit to our consumers, and our consumers certainly represent the eventually dominant interest in our population. * * * Germany has a large number of small industries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are they efficient?

Mr. WALLACE. They seem to be more efficient than our own; they are willing to sell at lower prices. The Germans are undoubtedly able to sell toys for less than our people are able to sell toys. * * *

Secretary Wallace thinks they are efficient because they are willing to sell for less than we do. If Americans worked as long hours and for as low wages as the Germans, they would equal that efficiency. Or, in other words, he would reduce American labor to the same plane as German labor or destroy them entirely. And if you pass this bill he will have more to do with its administration than any other man, for he has had a taste of the taxing power through the processing tax, and would be willing to have more.

Mr. TREADWAY. You would not approve of the expansion of the growing of cane sugar in Florida?

Mr. WALLACE. I would not, unless it is an efficient industry, and it is clearly not; they cannot produce as cheaply there as they do in Cuba.

Mr. TREADWAY. They can employ American hands.

Mr. WALLACE. We will have more net material welfare if we produce things we can produce efficiently and exchange them for goods produced more efficiently elsewhere.

From this statement you can see what will happen to your sugar industry.

This astounding revolution in American financial and commercial policy is not to be a mere emergency expedient. It is to be a permanent alienation of the powers of Congress. It is to make the Executive a permanent dictator over national revenue and commerce. I deny that the language purporting to limit tariff treaties to 3 years has any such meaning. The bill makes such agreements or treaties subject to termination, but they do not automatically terminate. They remain in full force and effect unless formal notice of termination is given in advance of expiration.

The spokesmen of the administration in advocating this bill plainly give notice that it is permanent legislation. Congress is duly warned that it need not expect to recapture its powers if this bill should withstand the judicial test.

I have no doubt that this measure, if enacted, would be kicked out of court as unconstitutional, but great damage would be done in the meantime.

Secretary Hull told the Committee on Ways and Means that much could be done in executive tariff lawmaking before this bill could be made void by the courts. He said he had in mind the phases of the bill which might be unconstitutional, but he made it plain that the bill should be enacted, even if it is unconstitutional. Here is what he said:

I have in mind all these phases, but at the same time I am literally moved, driven, and kicked into another line of thinking, which related to 30,000,000 unemployed people in the world. * * *

Mr. TREADWAY. If those 30,000,000 people scattered throughout the world and their families are a first consideration, should not that clause of the Constitution be amended in order to take care of the 30,000,000 people and not to violate the Constitution directly by legislative action?

Mr. HULL. That is what they said to Abraham Lincoln when he had to suspend one or two phases for the time being.

So, ostensibly for the time being, to help 30,000,000 people in foreign countries, the Secretary of State is willing to suspend one or two phases of the Constitution.

But is Congress willing? Is the Supreme Court willing? Are the people of the United States willing to destroy the safeguards of their liberty?

We have the solemn judicial admonition of Chief Justice Taft, in the majority opinion of the United States in the case of Hampton, Jr., against United States, that—

It is a breach of the national fundamental law if Congress gives up its legislative power and transfers it to the President or to the judiciary branch.

In meeting the economic emergency let us not make a bad matter worse by violating fundamental law. Let us not create a jungle in which we would wander blindly until extricated by the Supreme Court. Let us solve emergency problems by law and not by outrage of law. Let us give to the President powers that will be effective because they are constitutional—not deceptive and futile appearances of power that cannot withstand the blast of judicial condemnation. Let us not cheat the people by pretending that relief can be given by setting aside the Constitution. While we are trying to help the people, let us not rob them of their guaranties of safety against unbridled excesses of power.

Now is the time for sane thinking, not hysterical leaps into unknown difficulties which would increase our national hardships. We cannot afford to delude ourselves or the people at this critical time. As honest legislators, we know that we cannot strip Congress of its constitutional powers. Why not be honest with ourselves and the people?

The pending bill represents the acme of Democratic inconsistencies. It is the culmination of one attack after another upon the Constitution. It is the capstone to the monument of powers abdicated by the Congress and delegated to the President. It is a complete about-face of the President and the Democratic Party.

Two years ago they sought to take from the then President his limited powers under the flexible provision of the Republican tariff act to change rates of duty and to require him to recommend to Congress any increase or decrease in duties proposed by the Tariff Commission. The Democratic Party at that time would not trust even limited powers to the President, but would require him to come to Congress for approval of his recommendations, and that party undertook to justify their position on constitutional grounds.

Now, however, they go farther in this bill by clothing the President with what is practically plenary power to make rates of duty within the limitation of 50 percent of existing rates. From the President's action there would be no appeal.

The Democratic platform of 1932 advocated "a competitive tariff for revenue", with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference. On this plank the Democratic candidate for President, now the incumbent of the White House, stood unequivocally. In his Albany speech of July 30, 1932, he said:

It is a difficult and highly technical matter to determine standards and costs of production abroad and at home. A commission of experts can be trusted to find such facts, but not to dictate policies. The facts should be left to speak for themselves free from Presidential interference.

Note that the Democratic platform and the Democratic candidate were both opposed to "Presidential interference", and yet within the brief period of 2 years we find the President changing front on this question just as he changed front on his promise to preserve "a sound currency at all hazards."

In proposing the delegation of the autocratic power conferred by this bill, the President undertakes to give assurance "that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed."

When we remember the assurance given us by the President that he would administer the Economy Act with justice and sympathy toward veterans, which assurance caused many of us to support that measure, we cannot now but wonder what reliance may be placed in this latest assurance when we realize that by this bill you are placing the fate and destiny of our entire commercial structure in the hands of one man—power to use in his discretion. I declare and challenge successful contradiction that this is the first time in all our history that such grant of power has been proposed without recourse to Congress for approval of Presidential acts.

When the Democratic Party in this House 2 years ago sought to wrest from President Hoover his authority under the present law, they argued in favor of the prerogatives of Congress under the Constitution. Foremost was the able and distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. What my friend said then is even more applicable today in respect to the pending bill. He said:

Here in this body and in the body at the other end of the Capitol under the Constitution are joined the powers to devise and frame legislation affecting the revenues of this country and its domestic and foreign economic policies as far as they are affected by the tariff. This bill . . . is but a return to the Congress of the United States of that original power and jurisdiction affecting these measures which, in my opinion, should never have been taken away from it and vested exclusively in the Executive of this country (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1508).

That is what my friend from Alabama said when we had a Republican President. I am waiting with much interest to see what he will say and how he will vote on the present bill affecting a Democratic President. Let us see who is playing politics.

Likewise, my genial friend, my colleague from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, joined the gentleman from Alabama in protecting the constitutional rights of Congress.

Since Woodrow Wilson—

He said—

the Democratic Party has stood for the proposition of taking the tariff out of politics and against the other extreme of putting it up there in the Executive Mansion (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1510).

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD], the present Democratic whip, was equally vehement. He said:

The travesty in any tariff law, I think, has been to delegate the authority with reference to the creation of tariff duties and tax legislation to the Executive Department. I think it is contrary to the traditions of our Government, although the Supreme Court may have ruled that it is constitutional; still as a traditional policy of our country, I, as one Democrat, think I voice the sentiment of the majority of my party—I am opposed to the President of the United States enacting tariff duties or tariff fundamentals. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1511.)

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], a present member of the Ways and Means Committee, complained bitterly against delegating tariff authority to the President and the supine relinquishment of legislative power to the Executive.

We do not advocate—

He exclaimed—

autocracy and bureaucracy, yet there are men who permit their growth in the name of expediency. . . . The Fathers who wrote the Constitution never contemplated the placing of the power to fix rates in the hands of the President. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1538.)

But, Mr. Chairman, these expressions from our Democratic friends in the last Congress were but feeble echoes of the implications and denunciations hurled at the flexible provision of the Hawley-Smoot Act of 1930.

With no intention to further embarrass our Democratic friends, but with a view to refreshing their memories, let me quote briefly from the remarks of some of our distinguished Democratic friends made upon this floor at that time. We then had with us the present distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, for whom I have profound regard and respect. Judge Hull regarded flexible tariff provisions as "subversive of the plain functions of Congress" and an "unjustifiable arrogance of power and authority to the President."

Later on, in another body, he referred to the power granted to the President as a—

Vast and uncontrolled power larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of the Government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

And yet today we find our able Secretary of State advocating the passage of the pending bill, of which I might say he is the chief proponent.

The present Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the genial gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGLTON], was also solicitous for observing the constitutional rights of Congress. He said:

The fathers who framed the Constitution, wisely, in my opinion, left to Congress the initiating and enacting of laws raising revenue. The flexible provision giving the President the power to raise or lower tariff rates to the amount of 50 percent renders nugatory in spirit and practical effect this provision of the Constitution. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 17, 1929, p. 1474.)

In the same tenor spoke our distinguished Democratic friend, the former Speaker of the House, Mr. Garner; our friend the former Member from Georgia, Mr. Crisp; Judge Ragon, of Arkansas; the late lamented Mr. Collier, from Mississippi; and other prominent Democrats, whose remarks I will not now take the time to quote, but will insert them in the RECORD at this point.

HON. HARRY C. CANFIELD

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 17, 1929, p. 1484)

In my opinion, what is even worse than the raising of tariff schedules beyond all reason is the continuing of the flexible clause that is in the present law; and, in addition to that, in this bill you have given power to the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates to determine the value of any import brought into this country.

If this bill is passed, you will surrender the rights of Congress, to the executive branch of the Government, and will destroy the right of the judiciary, as far as customs are concerned.

I am a believer in the Tariff Commission. I believe this body should be a nonpartisan, fact-finding body; and I also believe that after this body has made a thorough examination of any rate that is not satisfactory that these facts should be turned over to Congress and on these findings of fact the Congress should act.

HON. CHARLES F. CRISP

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 15, 1929, p. 1349)

Gentlemen, think what a potential power the power to make tariff rates would be in an election year, to let the President of the United States have the right to write a tariff bill. Stop and think about it. Do you think there would be any dearth of campaign contributions?

O gentlemen, you are surrendering your right under the Constitution. Our forefathers fought for that right—the right that the elected Members of the people, the Representatives of the people, should alone have to levy taxes against them. [Applause.] And here you are surrendering it; and when you have surrendered it, do not expect that you will get it back soon. If you should surrender this power and should pass a law to repeal it, the President could veto it, and it would take a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress to override that veto, and it is seldom that either of the two great political parties in our country has a two-thirds vote in both branches of Congress.

O gentlemen, do not let the political exigencies of this case induce you to permit another entering wedge into the shrine of the Government as outlined by our forefathers, under which this Nation has grown and prospered until today it is the most powerful, the wealthiest, and most highly respected nation on earth.

HON. CORDELL HULL

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 13, 1929, p. 1212)

The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on the basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

HON. JOHN N. GARNER

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1929, p. 1080)

I want you all to turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes.

Remember this, gentlemen: When the legislative body surrenders its tariff power and its obligations to the Executive—under our system of government a majority can do that, but you can never recover them except by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate.

Remember that when you surrender this power of taxation you surrender it for all time to come or until the two bodies by a two-thirds vote can take it away from the Executive.

If an ambitious man is in the White House, he will not surrender it. If a wise and patriotic man is in the White House, he may have a want of confidence in the Congress, so neither of them would be willing to give up the power.

This is what you have in this bill: First, you have surrendered your right for an indefinite period to raise or lower the rates, because there will be no occasion for another tariff bill until the American people rebel against the iniquity of what I believe to be the highest and most indefensible bill ever imposed upon the statute books. And you make the Secretary of the Treasury the absolute arbiter, and you have taken away from the courts the opportunity of the parties affected going into court and having them review the action of the Treasury Department.

HON. HENRY T. RAINET

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 9, 1932, p. 1595)

This bill increases your power; it gives you more authority over the tariff reductions or tariff increases; it takes away the idea that you can correct the tariff by raising it 50 percent or lowering it 50 percent.

It takes away from the President the power that you gave him in order to avoid the responsibilities of the office to which you were elected. This bill will place more work on this House, and you are to do that in order to earn the salaries you are receiving. If you do not, the time will come when the electorate will demand that the salaries of Members of Congress be reduced until they are commensurate with the service that you actually render. You cannot render service by shirking responsibilities and by shirking work in these matters. We are giving back to you the authority over your own tariff.

Now, here is the best and most complete of all arguments against giving this plenary power to the President to fix duties and to negotiate trade agreements with foreign countries.

This was made when the Democrats in Congress were "all het up" over the proposal for a flexible provision in the tariff.

But before I read this let me here explain the exact difference between the Republican proposal then made and now the law and the Democratic proposal contained in this bill.

Ours was that the President could raise or lower to the extent of 50 percent the existing duty on any imported article—upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission—after ascertaining facts. Keep that in mind, after ascertaining the facts, where all interested parties had an opportunity to be heard. Nothing secret or covered up.

What is the Democratic proposal? That the President can do this without the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, without any ascertainment of facts or consultation of interested parties, but just according to his dictation. And added to that is the right to negotiate trade agreements with foreign countries, and none of these agreements are in any way subject to legislative review.

This is the official record of a protest made on September 30, 1929, against the flexible-tariff plan by the then Democratic minority in the Senate Finance Committee. Signed by Senator PAT HARRISON, Democrat, Mississippi, present chairman of the committee, and now in charge of the Roosevelt legislation. The protest was seconded by the following Senators, all Democrats: Senators KING, Utah; GEORGE, Georgia; WALSH, Massachusetts; BARKLEY, Kentucky; THOMAS, Oklahoma; and CONNALLY, Texas, each still Members of the Senate.

The interesting historical document reads:

A question of far-reaching consequences transcending consideration of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called "flexible provisions" of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive, unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of the right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

The statement then further attacks the flexible-tariff proposal, and continues:

The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character, is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

Calling attention to their attempts to secure Tariff Commission responsibility for the tariff changes, the Democrats declared:

For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and, furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary, and what we believe to be unconstitutional, authority passes now from the Congress it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff and regulation of commerce thereby will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everybody knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important question, we make this appeal.

It will be interesting to note what these same distinguished gentlemen will say about this much further reaching proposal of President Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman, never have I known of nor do I think there ever was a more complete stultification of views upon a fundamental question than is exhibited in the bill under consideration on the part of our Democratic friends.

For in this bill sent here by the President Congress is commanded to surrender absolutely to one man, without let or hindrance, the sole power to arbitrarily make tariff rates. Neither the industries to be affected nor labor in those industries will be vouchsafed even a hearing. We will not know what the rates are until they are proclaimed by the President.

I invite your attention to the statement made by Mr. Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, on March 6, 1934, just 2 weeks ago, at the Bar Association of New York City. Mr. Woll said:

In venturing into and applying the method of process of trade treaties with foreign governments it is essential that workers should have an opportunity to be heard. It is equally important that participation of labor, as at present made possible and available, through an appeal to Congress and through direct representation on the Tariff Commission, should in no way be lessened, but be increased.

Mr. Woll, in the same statement, with which I heartily agree, urged the enlargement of our domestic purchasing power and of increasing and protecting our home markets. On this point he said:

As against all these urgencies for increased export trade, reciprocal trade treaties, and other devices to that end, America's wage earners raise the more important issue of enlarging our domestic purchasing power and of increasing and protecting our home markets.

Government statistics clearly indicate more than 92 percent of the products of American labor and American agriculture are consumed in America. While this is an average figure of all commodities and include such important commodities as cotton, which is widely exported, it does indicate how great a domestic market we have in our own free-trade area. This great American consumption of American goods is largely due to the high standards of life and work which prevail in our country and have been established in the main through the untiring efforts of American organized labor. Our present problem is, rather, that of extending this home consuming power, in view of the constant losses which our producers of cotton, wheat, lumber, and other products have suffered and will increasingly suffer in the world markets by reason of a constantly growing competition from other nations.

Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of reciprocal tariff agreements such as were contemplated under the McKinley and Dingley tariff laws which would not be disadvantageous to our domestic market but upon terms representing true reciprocity, I am unalterably opposed to opening our markets to foreign-made goods by bartering away our American industry.

What we need, in my judgment, is restoration of confidence by removing the uncertainty surrounding our currency; by taking business out of the strait-jacket into which it is encased; by true economy; by stopping profligate expenditures; and by balancing the National Budget.

I am too much wedded to our American home market to stand by and see it destroyed by the invasion of products from the Old World, even though it were possible to restore our export trade by opening wide our doors to foreign-made goods.

I am opposed to any discrimination in this onslaught upon our home producers. The depression through which we have gone and are still going, despite all the proposed remedies of the new deal, was not caused by the present tariff law so bitterly condemned by our Democratic friends, but which they have not had the courage to change; that law has stood as a bulwark against more aggravated depression by protecting our industries and the labor employed by them and from ravishment and destruction by an influx of foreign-made goods seeking the best market in the world. We could not continue to produce from foreigners if foreigners are to produce for us. We must not at this time seek foreign markets at the expense of American consumers, nor yield our markets to foreign goods at the expense of the American wage earner. American wages is the hub of the tariff question from the American viewpoint.

The question is one of wages, reduction of wages, or no wages, and it matters little what cause contributed to their present level. Such causes could create but they could not maintain in the face of foreign invasion. In mistaken zeal for export trade we must not lose sight of the fundamental question of wages and the standard of living in this country.

Again I agree with Mr. Matthew Woll, representing the American Federation of Labor, when he said in the statement to which I referred a moment ago:

Is it possible that those who favor entering into reciprocal tariff treaties with foreign nations expect that those nations, where weekly hours exceeding 50 and 60 per week are not uncommon, are going to permit Americans to dictate to them what legislation or laws they shall enact for their people?

Unless this can be done, is it reasonable to suppose the products of American industries, with America's industrial workers producing for not more than 30 or 35 or even 40 hours per week, with wages which will permit of their retaining the American standards of living, can compete in the American market with products of foreign countries?

Unless it is intended to scrap the N.I.R.A. and force America's industrial workers to compete on an almost equal footing with the low-wage workers of Europe and Asia, there is no possible benefit to accrue from the fundamental change of government and new tariff policy proposed and involved.

Mr. Chairman, a favorite shibboleth of the Democratic Party throughout its vacillating history on the tariff question, one and the only one to which they have consistently adhered, is, "Capture the markets of the world." If they want to capture the world markets, why do they not have the courage to tell us openly and honestly how they propose to do it? Why this secrecy? Are you ashamed of your program?

When I recall the words of that distinguished statesman, the former Speaker of the House, Thomas B. Reed, and his homely illustration of Aesop's fable of the dog who lost his succulent shoulder of mutton by glibly jumping for the reflection in the stream, the question then, as now, was whether the tariff be lowered in order to open the markets of the world to American products.

The markets of the world—

Said Mr. Reed—

how broad and cold these words are. They stretch from the frozen regions of the North Pole across the blazing Tropics, to the high-bound shores of the Antarctic Continent—all this we can have if we will but give up the little handbreadth called the United States of America.

To hear these rhetoricians declaim you would imagine the markets of the world a vast vacuum waiting till now for American goods to break through, rush in, and fill the yawning void.

The dog in Aesop's Fables—

Mr. Reed said—

trotted along and looked over the side of the brink and he saw the markets of the world and dived for them. A minute after he was crawling up the bank the wettest, the sickest, the nastiest, and most muttonless dog that ever swam ashore.

Mr. Chairman, wherein would the American workingman advantage if we gain the world markets and he loses his job? We who believe in the principle of protection welcome discussion of the tariff question at any time, but the country expected that after the unbridled and vociferous maledictions and condemnation heaped upon the Hawley-Smoot Act by our Democratic friends in the last campaign, charging it with being responsible for the depression, there would at least be some attempt on their part when in control of the Government as they are now, to revise the rates of duty in that act in accordance with their widely proclaimed intention so to do.

When we asked you in the Seventy-second Congress why you did not act, you told us the reason you did not present your tariff program was because of a Republican President and it would not get anywhere. What is your excuse now? You have undisputed control of both branches of Congress and your own President, who sees eye to eye with you on the tariff. You do not have the courage in the face of the coming elections to tell the people of this country what the articles are on which you propose to reduce the tariff. The only thing you have the courage to say now is, "Let George do it."

And instead of applying yourselves to that task as you had solemnly promised in your platform and in your speeches on the stump, the only interest you have displayed in the subject has been two bills—the one in the last Congress to which I have referred, restoring to Congress its power to legislate on the subject of the tariff, and the other the pending bill, neither of which changed or proposes to change any tariff rate by Congress itself.

It is obvious, therefore, that the reckless denunciation of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act was mere vaporous hypocrisy. The distinguished Speaker of the House, Mr. RAINEX, replying to the taunts that his party had failed to carry out their threat or to fulfill their promise to reduce tariff rates, replied, dramatically:

Lower this tariff drastically? You (Republicans) will not do it, and we (Democrats) do not dare to do it with conditions as they are. We do not want this market flooded with products of cheap labor in other countries.

What Speaker RAINEX so well said at that time we Republicans say now. We do not want this country flooded with cheap, foreign-made goods. Whether tariff rates be reduced by Congress or by dictum of the President, we will not sell our birthright—the American market—for a foreign mess of pottage.

Mr. Chairman, in this bill sent here by the President a supine, spineless, sycophantic Congress is commanded to surrender absolutely to one man—the President of the United States—without let or hindrance, the sole power, arbitrarily to make tariff rates. I repeat that no such astounding and amazing grant of power ever before was requested, suggested, or dreamed of in all of our history and political philosophy.

It constitutes an affront to the Congress, the peoples' chosen representatives, and is an invitation to them to violate their oath of office which each man here has taken to support and defend the Constitution.

It is an insult to our intelligence and a brazen, arrogant, and presumptuous assault upon a constitutional power which alone resides in the Congress of the United States; and no exigency, real or fancied, nor can any plea of emergency condone, justify, or mitigate its evil purposes and consequences.

It is proposed not only to rob the Senate of its constitutional prerogative to ratify treaties, but it also takes away from the Congress its authority to raise revenue, for it has been recognized that in the making of tariff treaties the House of Representatives, where revenue bills must originate, has coequal power with the Senate. This power belongs to the Senate and House of Representatives jointly to authorize negotiations of tariff treaties; and to the Senate alone to ratify such treaties; and this power cannot be taken away except by due constitutional process of amendment to the Constitution. Neither can it be superseded even on the plea of emergency.

In this connection I am pleased to quote the words of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Said he in discussing the proposed emergency clause of the so-called "Black bill":

A constitutional government such as we have is the expression of the will of the people crystallized into the Constitution; and no power can change or suspend it except the power which makes it, and that is the people of the United States. It is the difference between a government of law and a government of men; between that of a republic, a democracy, and that of a dictatorship. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it, which are necessary to preserve its existence.

No power exists anywhere, in the Congress or in the courts, or in any body which Congress can create, to change the Constitution, either by suspension or otherwise, * * * not for 1 hour. If for 1 hour, it could be for 1 or 10 years. If for a day, it might be for 4 years, as in Germany, where all constitutional government, all forms of a republic, have been made to give way to a dictatorship.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is agreed that Alexander Hamilton was in favor of a strong central government. It is a popular, although fallacious, idea that Hamilton, if he could have had his way, preferred a military form of government with a strong iron hand at the head. Be that as it may, he was jealous in his advocacy for the adoption of the Constitution as written in the convention. Among the great arguments for its adoption which he set forth in the Federalist Papers is one on the treaty-making power of the Executive, which should arrest our attention and careful thought at this time.

Hamilton wrote:

The President is to have power "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

However proper or safe it may be in governments where the executive magistrate is a hereditary monarch to commit to him the entire power to make treaties, it would be utterly unsafe and improper to intrust that power to an elective magistrate for 4 years' duration. * * * An ambitious man might make his own aggrandizement, by the aid of a foreign power, the price of his treachery to his constituents. The history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue which would make it wise in a nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind as those which concern its intercourse with the rest of the world to the sole disposal of a magistrate created and circumstanced as would be a President of the United States.

Is the Congress, having become accustomed to the transfer of its constitutional powers to the Chief Magistrate, abjectly to complete the job, empty itself of all power and surrender complete obedience to the President? The answer to this question may be found in a succession of acts since March 4, 1933, by which Congress, little by little, abdicated its powers and conferred them upon the Executive. This legislative Caesarian food of questionable constitutionality has whetted the appetite of the President for more and greater powers until in the pending monstrous proposition we have the culmination of one assault after another upon the vitals of our republican form of government. This is not a partisan view of the proposed encroachment. It is shared in by thinking men and women of this Republic who hold dear our constitutional form of government.

Listen to what a distinguished Democratic Senator from North Carolina, Senator BAILEY, had to say upon this subject:

The Republic is not going by arms. * * * She is not going by sedition and conspiracy. This Republic will go when American liberty goes, in every step we take, giving way here and giving way there, negating personal liberty, almost unawares—here and here, there and there, forgetting the great traditions of the past that ought to guide us, forgetting the great standards by means of which the Republic has ever lived and must live, forgetting the spiritual fountains that have made her the source of light and life for 144 years. When we forget, when we cease to exercise vigilance, we begin to see the Republic taking a transformation and losing a character which amounts to more than revolution.

Yet and still, this patriotic appeal, this wise Democratic admonition goes unheeded, and however much or blandly the President's subservient apologists may disclaim his desire for a dictatorship, there is evidence in this latest proposed surrender to him that we are rushing headlong toward absolutism. Already you have placed in his hands the destiny of American industry, American labor, and American agriculture, and the welfare of 125,000,000 subjects in the domestic field, and now he asks or commands that you grant him unbridled, unrestrained power in the domain of international commerce to determine rates of duty—which he calls a tax—on the imports of foreign goods into the American market in competition with the products of American labor and of the American farmer.

With this power the question of international debts is so closely interwoven, that the President will tell you later, that to accomplish my full purpose—to fully support my position—you must grant me the further power to settle international debts. And if Congress is as supine then as you are now, it will not have the courage to refuse.

Every American citizen ought to stand aghast at such a proposal, and their representatives in the Congress of the United States ought to respond to the President's demand for omnipotency by an emphatic "no" that will reecho throughout the bounds of this Republic and awaken its citizens to the sense of their insecurity and to the imminent destruction of their constitutional liberties.

It is high time, Mr. Chairman, that the American people exercise vigilance and hold fast to their form of government before it is altogether too late. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, much has been said in regard to this tariff question, and if I were to talk all the afternoon, probably, I would not say anything particularly new.

We have heard these arguments throughout the years. It occurs to me that in one sense of the word the measure before us is not a tariff measure. It is a delegation of power to fix tariffs to the President of the United States. So that we are not dealing with a tariff measure, in the sense of fixing rates, but on the other hand, it is the most far-reaching tariff measure ever before any Congress, because of the power which it gives the President.

If the time had come when I believed the Congress should delegate this power, I still would be opposed to delegating the power to this particular administration, and my reason for this can best be illustrated in the following manner: If I had a child that I was not able to raise in my own home, in seeking a place for this child I would seek out a home that loved children, that had at heart their welfare and wanted to bring them forward as good citizens. I would not seek a home where they did not care for children and thought there were too many children in the world already. This illustrates the reason I would not delegate this authority to this particular administration.

The President of the United States is listening to the "brain trust." He is listening to professors in respect to this matter. These men are opposed to protection for any industry. I want to call your attention to just one little bit of testimony taken before the Committee on Agriculture. Mr. Weaver, one of these professors from the Agriculture Department, was before that committee and he said, in talking about the sugar bill, that it is the policy of the administration to eliminate the industry before it gets any bigger, and Mr. Tugwell, who followed him, was asked whether or not he approved and whether or not that was the attitude of the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Tugwell, referring to Mr. Weaver, said:

I think he believes that no industry is entitled to support by tariffs, and I may say, personally, that I agree with him. I see no reason why it should be.

I am not willing to trust the tariff-making power of this country to an administration that has no sympathy whatever with the protective tariff under which we have lived in this country.

The sugar bill, to which I have referred for the last few days, has apparently been shelved and I am wondering if this is because of the fact that if the pending bill is enacted, then the administration can do all that it had intended to do to the sugar industry by and under and by virtue of that law, and will not need the enactment of the sugar bill which has been before the Committee on Agriculture.

This pending measure gives authority to the President of the United States overnight the power to summarily reduce tariffs 50 percent without any hearing before any commission and without consultation with anybody. In other words, he can deal with this question just as he dealt with the air-mail contracts, and I am going to venture the assertion that there has not been any action of this administration that has caused the straight-thinking business people of the country to lose confidence in it more than has the canceling of all air-mail contracts without a hearing involving as it does the welfare of thousands of our citizens. The people are waiting, and not any too patiently, an opportunity to express their disapproval of any further delegation of power that belongs to this Congress to the President of the United States. Pass this bill and you give to Professor Tugwell and others that much more of a free hand to put into effect in this country their doctrines of socialism and communism.

I represent largely an agricultural district. I have been unable to figure out where, by any trade agreements that this bill authorizes the President to enter into, any benefit can come to agriculture. In other words, the products that would come in here would no doubt be the raw products that would more or less compete with agricultural products and we would send out manufactured articles and the farmer would be the sufferer under such legislation. [Applause.] I am unwilling to commit the authority to fix tariff rates into the hands of the traditional enemies of the protective tariff.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill, H.R. 8687, reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee, is in response to a message of the President of the United States sent to Congress on March 2, 1934, and is a most important administration measure.

On this bill, as has been the case on previous tariff measures, the two great political parties of this country are definitely divided. That was to be expected, because that is in keeping with the history and traditions of these great parties in this Nation. The 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee divided exactly along party lines. The 15 majority members voted for the measure and the 10 minority members voted against it.

In approaching the discussion of this subject it is important that we bear in mind conditions which makes such legislation necessary. A few days more than a year ago the Democratic Party assumed control of the affairs of this Government of ours after the Republican Party had been in control of the affairs of our Nation for 12 years.

Without entering into any discussion as to the reasons, or without attempting to assign the causes, it might be well for us to remind ourselves in passing of some conditions that existed in this Nation of ours at that time.

The industry of this Nation was paralyzed, the wheels of commerce were ceasing to turn, and agriculture was bleeding at every pore. The American farmers were receiving the lowest prices for their commodities than had been received in the recorded history of our Nation.

From twelve to fifteen million of American citizens were anxiously walking the streets and highways of this land vainly seeking an opportunity to work and make a living for themselves and their families. At the very hour when the newly elected President of the Nation stood before this Capitol to take the oath of office the banks of practically all the States of the Union were closed. The business of this Nation was paralyzed, and we were in the worst economic condition we have ever found ourselves in the history of the country.

Now, with that situation existing throughout the length and breadth of this country, this great President of ours, who had been chosen as the leader of the American people, came forward with a recovery program. He reminded the Congress of the necessary enactment of certain legislation which was designed and intended to improve conditions and effectuate recovery in the affairs of this country of ours and in the affairs of the American people.

During the last year legislation has been passed as a part of this recovery program, which conferred on the President of the United States certain broad discretionary authority insofar as the domestic affairs of this country are concerned. The passing of these various measures conferred on the President broad discretionary authority with reference to the internal or domestic affairs of the people of this country.

The pending bill simply goes one step further in this recovery program and confers upon the President of the United States the same type of broad discretionary authority insofar as our international trade relations are concerned. That is the purpose of this bill and is exactly what it does.

It might be well for us to remind ourselves of some of the conditions that exist in this and other countries of the world as we determine the question of the feasibility of enacting legislation of this type.

Let us for a moment think of the world-trade conditions. During recent years the world has been experiencing a period of acute economic distress and suffering.

The President, addressing the Congress, speaking of the decline of world trade, had this to say:

Measured in terms of the volume of goods in 1933, it has been reduced to approximately 70 percent of the 1929 volume. Measured in terms of dollars, it has fallen to 35 percent.

Then the Secretary of State, appearing before the Committee on Ways and Means when this bill was under consideration, made this statement:

According to reliable estimates, if world trade had gone forward with the annual ratio of gain existing before the war, the nations during the intervening years would have had some $275,000,000,000 more than they have actually enjoyed; and according to these estimates, if world trade had thus progressed, there would be today an annual international commerce of nearly $50,000,000,000 instead of the pitiable figure of less than $12,000,000,000 for 1933. International trade has steadily grown less each year since 1929. The reduction of international trade in the amount of $40,000,000,000 means a reduction of the world production by $40,000,000,000, and this means a reduction in consumption of a like amount, and this means correspondingly low standards of living.

That was the expression of the Secretary of State as he appeared before the committee giving us an idea of the world economic conditions as they exist today.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The Secretary of State is, of course, a very distinguished and charming and able gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman cannot too highly compliment the Secretary of State, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. CULKIN. He served here in the House, and at that time, as I recall him, he was distinctly an avowed free trader. He did not believe in any tariff.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I seriously doubt whether the distinguished gentleman from New York has a right to so characterize the Secretary of State.

Mr. CULKIN. That is the way I construed his attitude. The gentleman from Tennessee is making a most delightful speech, and I dislike to interrupt him, but what I am interested in is how we are going to deal with a case like that of Japan under the favored-nation clause. In Japan men get as little as 12 cents a day and women 7 cents a day. How is the gentleman going to handle a situation like that under this proposed measure?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman compliments me. I am not going to execute this law. If I should have that duty assigned to me, I would certainly make a most careful investigation into all existing conditions and circumstances, and if I had the opportunity to meet Japan across the table, I would try to make the best possible trade I could for the people of this country, and I have no doubt that that is what the President of the United States will do under the authority of this measure.

Mr. CULKIN. Then I assume the gentleman would favor the Japanese workman getting more pay?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I would be delighted to see them get more pay.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the United States should be unable to negotiate a reciprocal trade agreement of advantage to us, certainly we would not in that case be in any worse condition than we are now.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It should always be borne in mind that the President of the United States representing the whole people of the United States, and who enjoys as great a degree of confidence of the people of this country as has ever been enjoyed by any man, when he sits down at the table with the representative of another country, will endeavor to do the best he can for the people of this country. It is not within the realms of probability that he is going to forget the welfare and interest of the American people. Furthermore, as suggested by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL], unless the type and kind of trade agreement that does impress him as being to the interest and advantage of the people of this country can be made, he simply does not have to trade at all.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has noted the suggestion of the administration or some of the gentlemen in the administration of the Agricultural Department urging a reduction in the production of beet sugar in America. I assume that the gentleman is in favor of that?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No; the distinguished gentleman from New York is not undertaking to quote me on the beet-sugar industry because I have given no utterance on the subject.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that these tariff negotiations must result in that sort of bargaining?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Not at all. I have heard some statements made here during the course of this debate upon what different officials of the Government may have said on the beet-sugar question and other questions, but it is rather significant to me to note that none of those who, in all probability, will have charge of the administration of this measure have been quoted in that connection. Of course, these trade agreements are to be negotiated by the President of the United States. Naturally international affairs are conducted through the State Department. Somebody has quoted some third or fourth or fifth assistant or some other subordinate in the Agricultural Department. There is nothing here to indicate that he would have any voice in these affairs at all. I commend to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture himself when he appeared before the committee. He said, in substance, as I now recall it: "I say now, as I have on all other occasions, so far as the sugar question is concerned, that I do not think our production of cane and beet sugar should be further expanded in this country"; and that is as far as he went, and he stated that that is as far as he has gone at any time.

As one who tried to place a fair construction on the statements of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, and every other witness who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, I say to the gentleman that I got no impression that the Secretary of Agriculture had in mind to do any such things or attempt to do any such things as gentlemen on the floor here have indicated they are fearful he might do.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Briefly, if you please.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman states that the negotiation of these tariff treaties will be in the hands of the Secretary of State?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I said to the gentleman that, of course, international relations are, in the very nature of things, primarily the functions of the State Department.

Mr. CULKIN. And it involves very difficult and intricate negotiation. The President, of course, could not do that individually; but what I wish to ask the gentleman is, if it is not a fact that the difference between Professor Moley, the distinguished editor of Today, and the present distinguished Secretary of State lies in the fact that Professor Moley was for a vigorous nationalism and the present Secretary of State is for an internationalism; is that not true?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York has the same right to form his opinions as to what differences may have existed between those gentlemen as I have. I am not disposed to enter into any discussion of any differences that may have developed between the Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretary of State. That is a matter aside from this question.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I had not thought to interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee. I am very much interested in what he has to say, and I should not have interrupted him if he had not yielded to others. I want to ask the gentleman if he seriously believes that the President of the United States, with all the present duties of that office devolving upon him, will have time to personally negotiate treaties or make the investigations that are necessary if we are to enter into trade agreements upon a basis that will be equitable to the people of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I submit to my distinguished colleague from Michigan that the bill itself speaks on that point in the language contained on page 2, as he well knows, for I recall that he asked the same question many times during the hearings. On page 2, lines 9 and 10:

The President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States—

And so forth.

The language of this act is what you and I have to vote on. The provisions of the bill itself are what we answer "yea" or "nay" on when the Clerk calls our names. That is what the bill provides. I have no doubt that the President of the United States will faithfully perform the trust that is imposed in him by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And the gentleman is not afraid that the President of the United States will make any trade or agreement that will be detrimental to the people of this country?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Not at all; no, sir; and I hope to touch upon that point in a few moments, if I may use a little of my time.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield for one further question, and then I will not ask him to yield further, unless he expresses a desire to be very generous to other Members in yielding. I want to ask my friend if this bill, along with the other powers which it extends to the President, will create additional time at the disposal of the President of the United States in which he may give proper consideration to the great duties devolving upon him under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I respectfully submit to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan that the answer I have endeavored to give him is a fair answer to that question and includes the question which he has very kindly submitted to me.

Mr. FORD. May I answer that question for the gentleman?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Who thought that the President of the United States would be called upon to settle the automobile trouble in this country, and that he would be able to find time for that? Who has the temerity to say that he did not do a good job of it? [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, and then I must decline to yield further.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am asking this question, not to embarrass the gentleman but to get some information that will enable me to act intelligently upon this bill. I am worried about the effect of the so-called "favored-nation" treaties.

Suppose, for instance, the President should find it desirable to make a treaty with Sweden, which manufactures matches, permitting the exchange of American commodities, say, wheat for matches, upon a reciprocal basis? Japan, I understand, has a treaty containing the favored-nations clause. Would the entering into of a treaty with Sweden automatically authorize or permit Japan to enjoy the same privilege that we give to Sweden under the operation of the favored-nation clauses?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I assume my distinguished colleague understands the operation of the favored-nation treaties.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If I understood that fully, I would not have asked the question.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I may not be able to fully answer the gentleman in the time I have, but my conception of it is that when different nations enter into those treaties with the so-called "favored-nation" clause in the treaty—and I might say that we have 48 of that type treaties now—it simply means that a provision is contained therein to the effect that if you accord certain treatment to other nations you are bound to accord similar treatment to me as one of the nations having negotiated a favored-nation treaty with you.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. So, if we accorded to Sweden the privilege of exporting matches to the United States with a reduction of 50 percent in the duty upon those matches, automatically the duty upon matches from Japan would be reduced 50 percent also, despite the fact that, of course, Japanese laborers receive very much less pay than the laborers in Sweden?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, our distinguished colleague may apply the interpretation which I have endeavored to give him, as I understood it, to any condition existing in the nations of the world.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I know the gentleman will not have time to answer all of these questions in detail, and I commend the gentleman from Minnesota that he take the hearings at page 365 and following pages, where the Assistant Secretary of State went into that question and explained it rather fully.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. Chairman, as I was endeavoring to touch briefly upon the situation of world-trade conditions at the time I was interrupted by these various questions, I should like to return for the moment to that subject in order that we may have very definitely in mind some of the conditions existing throughout the world that impressed me at least with the importance of this country giving consideration to these conditions, and especially as they apply to the trade of this country.

The total exports of the United States fell from $5,241,000,000 in 1929 to $1,675,000,000 in 1933, while the imports fell from $4,399,000,000 in 1929 to $1,449,000,000 in 1933. The decline in American commerce has steadily continued.

The point is that in this great shrinkage of world trade we are not only losing in the same proportion as other nations of the world but we are losing at a greater rate than the other countries of the world. Many of the markets we are now losing, of course, are being taken by other countries of the world. Under our present arrangement and under conditions as they now exist, we have not been able to hold our own in world trade affairs.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I would prefer not to yield unless it is for a question along this particular line.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The question I wish to ask is on this particular point. In the gentleman's opinion what effect does the increased cost of production in this country have on the diminution of our foreign trade, which trade we are losing to countries having lower costs of production? In other words, the cost of products manufactured in France is more nearly on a par with the cost of products manufactured in Italy than is the cost of products manufactured in the United States, because of our high wage scale, high cost of living, and our high standard of living. Does not the gentleman feel that one reason for the higher cost of our products is our standard of living, and does this not have some effect upon international trade?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I say to the gentleman very frankly that I have no doubt the points mentioned by him enter into the picture and have some bearing on it, of course, but I do not think they are the controlling elements by any means. Many phases of the matter must be taken into consideration.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The increased cost of production under the N.R.A. is offset almost equally by the depreciation of the dollar.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, that is true. The question of the value of the dollar and other matters related to it naturally enter into a consideration of this whole subject.

Now, passing for a moment, if I may, to the question of our diminished share of this world trade, I shall call attention briefly to a few figures that indicate the true situation on this point.

The American share of the import trade of the world in 1929 amounted to 12.19 percent; and our share of the export trade of the world in that same year amounted to 15.61 percent. In 1932 the American share had fallen to 9.58 percent of the imports of the world, and to 12.39 percent of the exports.

In other words, whereas in 1929 the United States enjoyed 13.83 percent of the total world trade, in 1932 its share had fallen to 10.92 percent.

This reflects the situation that exists today insofar as the international trade affairs of our country are concerned.

One very important thing for us to bear in mind is the ever-increasing tendency of the other nations of the world to equip themselves with the necessary machinery to meet quickly the changing trade conditions of the world. They are resorting to all types of devices and what might be characterized as schemes to hold their own in this competition for international trade, and we are simply to be left behind because under our system we are not equipped with the necessary machinery to keep pace with the others in this competition for international trade.

The Secretary of State, I now recall, told the committee that of the 65 countries of the world practically all have some form of trade barriers. The practice of erecting trade barriers is continuing and increasing all the time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I also recall that during the hearings it was shown to your committee that some 68 or 69 tariff-quota agreements have been made by European countries since January of last year, showing the ever-increasing tendency of these other countries of the world to enter into trade agreements and quotas and arrangements among themselves and constantly to erect trade barriers. Thus we find it difficult to undertake international trade with them.

Reference has been made several times to different countries that may have something to export to us. As I endeavored to point out a few moments ago, I have no doubt at all that the President of the United States is going to consider the interest of all the American people and of the industries of this country when these trade agreements are negotiated and entered into.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Admitting the interest, of course, of the President in protecting American industries, will the gentleman not be good enough to point out to us what particular articles he considers will be used to increase our importations?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I say to our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts that I am not prepared at the moment to do that. I would not do it if I had the information. I do not think it is a sound business principle to send the person with whom you expect to make a trade advance information on the points you have in mind. [Applause.] That is just the common-sense viewpoint.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman's answer is as explicit and as plain as was made by any person advocating the passage of this bill before the committee. In other words, will not the gentleman admit that he is not willing to confide to the American people in what lines the importations will be increased under the proposed bill?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I do not think the information is at present available; and, as I said a moment ago, even if it were available, it would be the height of folly and entirely out of keeping with the sound Yankee trading principles of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to give out his thunder and trading material before he meets the other man in the trade and finds out what he may have.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I suggest to the gentleman that the distinguished Assistant Secretary of State in advocating the measure unconsciously admitted one day that foreign countries had approached the State Department with certain suggestions. What is the gentleman's idea? If those suggestions are in the hands of the State Department, why should they not be in the hands of the Congress?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am sure the distinguished gentleman, upon reflection, will realize that question hardly does him credit.

Mr. TREADWAY. I may say to the gentleman that I have reflected on it so long that I am thoroughly convinced of the merit of the question and the undesirability from the standpoint of the Democrats of answering the question.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, I am sure the gentleman will readily appreciate that, even if the State Department has been approached, as the Assistant Secretary stated, and I have no doubt they have, they cannot come here and state the whole proposal and put out all the details and information in reference to the negotiations that they expect to enter into through diplomatic relations. The question hardly does the author the credit to which I think he is entitled.

The distinguished gentleman from New York made reference during the course of his remarks—and I have never seen the gentleman labor harder on any subject than he did on the speech he made here today—to one item he claimed he had gleaned from the hearings held on this bill. This was with reference to toys. He made some remark as to the proposition that this country might export quantities of lard and hog products, as well as agricultural products, to Germany in exchange for toys. I just took occasion hurriedly to look up the situation with reference to the importation of toys, which seemed to alarm him so much in connection with this bill. The latest figures I was able to secure for the year 1931 showed domestic production of toys in 1931 to be $68,307,000. The imports in 1933 of dolls, toys, and parts amounted to $2,225,000, or 3 percent. This 3-percent importation of that commodity is disturbing and scaring the gentleman to death. Similar figures might be cited as to many other points that seem to be disturbing some of the gentlemen on the minority side who are opposed to this measure.

As was shown during the hearings on this bill, there are 29 separate countries each of which is the principal source of supply of commodities to the United States. These countries also furnish a market for 85 percent of our exports. With this kind of a situation existing so far as concerns 29 countries of the world, the principal sources of supply for leading commodities that this country imports, and at the same time furnishing a market for 85 percent of our exports, certainly it is within the range of possibility that we may sit down at a table with representatives of countries of that kind and be able to do some business that would be very definitely in the interests of agriculture and the business of this country. According to the figures given by the Secretary of Agriculture when he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, we are exporting some 55 or 60 percent of our cotton, some 20 percent of our wheat, and some 40 percent of our tobacco, as I recall the figures now, about half of our packing-house lard and exporting considerable quantities of many other agricultural products. With these ever-shrinking foreign markets, what is going to become of the agriculture of this country? What is going to become of affairs in this country when the purchasing power of agriculture shrinks even further? It is of the highest importance that we negotiate these trade agreements with other countries of the world to the end that we may sit down at the table with them and in a spirit of friendliness which should prevail between the nations of the world as it should between individuals, say to them: "Now, here, we have certain products in this country of ours that you need. You have to import them. You have to get them from somewhere in the world outside of your own country. You have certain things that we need and can use. Let us see if we cannot do some business on a simple, common-sense, American business basis." If we can, all very well and good. The President may enter into such trade agreements. If he cannot do it to the advantage of the American people he simply does not have to make the trade. He does not have to enter into the agreement.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention especially to what impresses me as the principal objection raised to this bill by our distinguished colleagues on the left. This has been very properly termed a fear of what might happen. In this connection I simply invite attention to the expression of the President of the United States himself. We may theorize and generalize all we please, we may build up straw men to knock down. We may try to find something to scare ourselves, we may manufacture all kinds of objections and think up all types of things that might happen, but after all, as I pointed out a few moments ago, the very specific and definite language of this bill itself provides that the authority shall be vested in the President of the United States. It imposes upon him the responsibility and the duty of finding that these conditions exist before he can exercise the authority that is conferred under the provisions of this measure. I invite attention to the expression of the President in transmitting this subject-matter to Congress for consideration in his message of March 2, 1934. The pending bill is the result of this message. On page 2 of the message there is the following:

The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed. The adjustment of our foreign-trade relations must rest on the premise of undertaking to benefit and not to injure such interests. In a time of difficulty and unemployment such as this, the highest consideration of the position of the different branches of American production is required.

That is the expression of the President himself in his message on this subject.

As was indicated by the question of the distinguished gentleman from New York, I have no doubt that our great President will exercise this discretion in the interest of all the people of this country. I do not think there is anything to cause alarm in the record of that great patriot and statesman, that man who is giving his very life in the service of the people of this country and the service of the whole people of the Nation, whose confidence he enjoys to a greater extent than any other man, I think, in the history of the Nation, the greatest leader the Nation has seen for a half century or more. Certainly there is no American interest that has any reason to fear or feel disturbed about the exercise of discretion by that type of patriot and statesman who is in charge of the affairs of this great Government of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen: For the past few days the House has had the privilege of listening to a very able discussion of the measure before us.

Members on the Democratic side have presented their theory with great candor and ability. On the Republican side our membership has rallied to the defense of the traditions of our party with great ability. I dare say few speeches have ever been made in this Congress that will surpass the speech made this afternoon by our distinguished floor leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

This is a very important measure. I think we are at the parting of the ways with reference to party policy concerning the tariff. We are about to make an important decision here. If the Democrats pass this bill, which no doubt they will, they will find themselves diametrically opposed to the traditions of their party. They are, apparently, bound to follow their leader, the President, without regard to where he leads them. I have no desire to detract from his work in any way, but I want to say to you that, today, the Democratic Party is marching directly opposite to the position taken by Thomas Jefferson and its great leaders from Jefferson down to this day, especially the leaders for the past 75 years. I know that in their hearts a great many of the good Democrats agree with me in this respect.

I have the honor of following on the floor here today my good friend from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, a fine, upstanding, young man; and if he stays in this Congress as long as his predecessor, Finis Garrett, his record will, no doubt, shine with that distinguished Tennessean and with the other Tennessean [Mr. BYRNS], who is now the floor leader of the Democrats.

However, my distinguished friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] gives his case away completely this afternoon. He states here that the President will sit down at a table and will discuss with the envoys of Japan and make his decision then. This is the whole crux of this bill. When the President makes this decision he will be levying a duty, he will be levying a tax, which, according to the Constitution, is absolutely within the province of the Congress and is not in any way within the province of the President. So I say to you that he refutes his own position entirely, as well as the position taken by the Democratic Party throughout the ages.

The gentleman from Tennessee says that the President of the United States will not do anything wrong. It is a great compliment to our theory of government, the greatest compliment anyone can pay us, that not from the days of George Washington down to today has any President ever sold out the country. None of our Presidents, Democratic or Republican, has ever been guilty wilfully of doing anything that he felt would react against his country, but a number of them have done things that were not for the best interests of the country. I am perfectly willing to admit that probably many Republican Presidents have done things that were not for the best interests of the country, and likewise I would have to assert that many Democrats have done things that were not for the best interests of the country. They were all honest, but they were not all right all the time. It is in that spirit I voice my opposition to this bill.

The burden of the song of every Democrat who has spoken on this measure has been that we need this legislation to encourage our imports. Let me give you a few figures that will completely answer this statement.

Every month since June of 1933, without exception, has shown an increase in our imports and exports over the like periods of the preceding year. If our imports and exports are increasing every month, why should we tamper with them by invoking a proposition we know nothing about? Why should we deviate from the time-honored policies of both parties, to keep within the province of the Congress the duties that the Constitution gives it? The following table will show the movements of imports and exports into and from America for the period since June 1933:

Unlike most tariff bills this bill is a short one. Reducing it to simple language and omitting nonessentials it could be expressed about as follows:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States, by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States, the President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting foreign trade, is authorized:

First. To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments, and Second. To proclaim such modification of existing duties as are required to carry out any such foreign agreement. But he cannot increase or decrease by more than 50 percent any existing rate, or transfer any article from the dutiable to the free list. Cuba is to be given preference on her exports. The President is given the right to suspend modifications of duties made by him to countries which accord discriminatory treatment to American commerce. The President may at any time terminate such modifications.

Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

By this bill Congress gives the President authority to enter into secret contracts with foreign nations with relation to tariffs. When the Constitution gives Congress certain powers it at the same time enjoins upon Congress the duty of assuming these powers. A surrender of these duties by Congress is a dereliction of its duty. The Constitution gives the President certain powers. When he assumes the powers given to another branch of the Government even though surrendered to him by such other branch because of its weakness, he is assuming powers not intended for him and the assumption of the same by him tends to weaken the Government. Our Government is strongest when each of the three divisions are capable of functioning completely and without surrender.

By this bill no time limit is provided for its termination. The language is ambiguous and uncertain. The last paragraph seeks to define a time for limitation, but to my mind this bill gives the President the right to use his discretion without much limitation either as to time or substance. By removing the required formula "difference in cost of production", the bill practically nullifies the whole law, for 50-percent limitation will then be uncertain.

In the advocacy of this measure we see a complete reversal of position by the leaders of the majority party from that expressed by them when the 1930 Tariff Act was under consideration in the House. At that time the flexible-tariff provision was adopted. Its constitutionality was assailed by the Democrats most vigorously. In that bill Congress designated specifically what could and could not be done, and the Executive was given specific authority. He was not given unlimited discretion. That bill provided that the President could alter the rates fixed by Congress when and if the Tariff Commission, after investigation as to the cost of production here and abroad, recommended certain changes in the rate. Under that bill the President had no power to do anything of his own volition. The powers given him were powers to do certain things when and if a fact-finding agency would find certain facts for him. If the Democrats strained at this surrender of power by the legislative branch to the President, it is difficult to reconcile their conduct then with their conduct now, when they rush to support and pass a bill giving the President unlimited power to bargain for tariff rates and to do so at his own discretion and secretly and without any accountability to anyone for what he might do.

In that connection, I want to discuss the line of argument of my friend from Tennessee. Ladies and gentlemen, there is one thing that has made American diplomacy distinctive. Our diplomacy differs from that of every other diplomacy in that ours has been open and aboveboard. The diplomacy of foreign countries has been secret, and in that system we have seen chicanery; in that we have seen deceit. If we ever come to the time and place when we must deal secretly, and without taking into our confidence the American people, it will be a colossal mistake. Talk about democracy! Talk about State rights! When this President has served his term out, his new deal will have wrecked the proud traditions of the Democratic Party and they will be walking by the still waters in solemn contemplation. This country is not yet ready for dictatorship and Russian socialism. Rugged individualism is safer than ragged socialism. Whether to be proud, free citizens or servile subjects is the question we must soon decide if we continue this course of surrender of legislative authority to satiate Executive thirst for power. Someone in the course of this debate suggests McKinley, the great protector of American industry, might have favored this legislation, and that this legislation is in line with the McKinley tariff bill. Let no one be deceived by this insinuation. McKinley, the representative of my State on the Ways and Means Committee, which assignment I have now the honor to hold, was great as a Governor of a great State, and great as President of our country, but his greatest service to America is seen in his efforts to enact legislation that brought the country out from under the Grover Cleveland depression. The McKinley tariff bill carried no dictatorial powers to the President.

No! McKinley's greatest accomplishment was not in his having been President. When the impartial historian writes the story of Major McKinley and his contributions to the welfare of his country he will say, although his record as a soldier was one of which any soldier might well be proud, and although his record as a Governor of a great State was an illustrious one, and although his record as a peace-time and a war-time President was equal to the best, still his work as the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in connection with tariff measures that bear his name was his greatest contribution to the welfare and growth of his country, for it contributed mightily toward making the United States the greatest nation in the world. [Applause.]

In determining whether one should support the measure, he can ask himself two questions?

First, Is it constitutional?

Second, Is it right as a policy?

A negative answer to either of these queries will be sufficient to call for a rejection of the bill. To favor this bill one must answer affirmatively both of these queries.

Is the bill constitutional? Does it provide for a surrender by Congress of its power "to lay and collect duties and imports" and "to regulate commerce with foreign nations", as provided in section 8 of article I of the Constitution?

As with probably every provision of the Constitution, courts through judicial decisions have run out every possible implication, so the courts have been called upon frequently to interpret the language above referred to. There is no question but that Congress can designate an agency to carry into execution its enactments. It can lay down the rule by which something is to be done, and this rule is thereby a part of the law. When such agencies perform according to that rule they are not enacting legislation but are executing legislation. The Congress is in effect authorizing and instructing such agency to perform in a certain way. But if such agency attempted to use its own discretion in making or changing such rule it would be exceeding its authority, and even if Congress would attempt to give such agency the authority to change such rule its efforts would be null and void, for before such agency can have a right to legislate it must get it from a higher source than Congress. It must receive it from the Constitution, which is the same source from which Congress received its authority to legislate.

Before the President can legislate he must get the authority from some source. As yet the Constitution has not given him that authority, "the right to lay duties" and "to regulate commerce with foreign nations" is exclusively the power of Congress. Congress has no right to pass this authority on to someone else. If the makers of the Constitution wished that to be done, it is safe to assume that they would have said so.

Witnesses in behalf of the administration—for this is the administration's bill—at the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee set out in great detail their views as to the constitutionality of this bill, but through it all they have failed to draw the distinction between provisions granting the Executive the power to find facts, then apply them according to a prescribed rule, and provisions giving the Executive the power to enter into secret negotiations without any prescribed rule except the rule of his own arbitrary discretion. This bill seeks to give the Executive power which the Congress cannot give away and which the Executive has no right to receive. Of all State court decisions dealing with this subject probably the decision of Judge Ranney, of Ohio, is the most quoted. Judge Ranney is by many considered the John Marshall of the Ohio Supreme Court. In the case of Railroad v. Commissioners (1 Ohio Stat. 88) he says:

The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution to be exercised under and in pursuance of law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made.

Probably the most decisive Federal decision on this subject is that found in Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649). The court in that case says:

That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular case under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them, that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed, that is, which he found to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President. The words "he may deem" in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension as to that country, which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

At this point I want to take up the cases cited a few minutes ago by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. I was very much pleased, and listened with a degree of interest to the gentleman from Texas, and I was interested in the strategy of the distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in thrusting Mr. SUMNERS in at, perhaps, the most strategic position in the debate. Why did he do that? Because he knows the high standing the gentleman from Texas enjoys with the Membership on both sides of the aisle, not only in scholarship but as a real gentleman.

Mr. SUMNERS gave you the development of this question as it took its course through devious legislative enactments and through intricate court decisions.

I make this positive statement—and I think I have read all the leading decisions on this proposition—that in no decision anywhere has any court ever stated that the Congress of the United States has any right to delegate its power of legislation to any President or anyone else, and that the President of the United States has no right to fix tariff duties.

That runs through every decision from the first case under Washington. In that case the President was given no power to levy a tax or to levy a duty.

His powers were strictly powers of administration, and this is the case on down to the great case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649) cited by the distinguished gentleman from Texas. Let me read to you what that decision is. Just as Mr. SUMNERS said, it is difficult to discuss these dry questions, because they involve intricate propositions of law, but here is some language in this decision that I think anybody can understand. He need not be a lawyer or a Congressman, because it is written out clearly. I quote:

Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

The gentleman will note that it provides specifically in that case that nothing was left to the President to do except to follow the law laid down by Congress. Again I quote:

The words "he may deem" in the third section implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing sugar, and when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions reciprocally unequal and uneven were imposed on the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country exporting sugar, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring suspension as to that country.

His duty is laid down specifically as to what he must do when somebody else has made certain findings.

He had no discretion in the premises except with respect to the duration and suspension so ordered.

That is one thing that I should like to impress upon you. The President had no discretion with respect to anything except the time limit. That related only to the enforcement of a policy established by Congress.

Again I quote:

As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to legislative will, he exercised the functions of making laws.

There is no case—and I defy anybody to produce a decision from any court—upholding the constitutionality of any law that gives to the President the right to levy a tax. If he is given the right to levy a tax in this bill, what is he going to do about it? When he sits around the table with Japan, as my friend from Tennessee says, what is he going to do if he is not going to agree on a tax? And I say to you that that is the very thing that he has no right to do.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will yield there, I shall be glad to yield him more time.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Certainly, I am glad to yield so that the House may receive an important message from the Senate. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935—MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 14; agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 22, with an amendment; and further insist upon its amendment no. 23 to said bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and for consideration at this time the conference report upon the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto and consider the Senate amendments at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 6663, with Senate amendments thereto and consider the same at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask the gentleman to yield to me for a statement.

Mr. WOODRUM. I should be very glad to give the gentleman some time if this consent is granted.

Mr. CONNERY. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, no. 14, and agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of Senate no. 22 with an amendment as follows:

"In section 27 of said amendment strike out the second proviso.

"In section 28 of said amendment strike out the second proviso in the fourth paragraph of section 20 of Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, as amended by such section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided further, That subject to the limitations above prescribed, except as to receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, and notwithstanding the provisions of Public Act No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or any other law, veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is established on or after this paragraph as amended takes effect as service connected in accordance with the provisions of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, shall be entitled to receive compensation in accordance with the provisions of such act, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933; but veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is reestablished as service connected under such section 200 by section 27 of title III of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935, shall be paid 75 percent of the compensation under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended and such rating schedule."

The Senate further insists on its amendment no. 23.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 22, and on that I ask recognition.

Mr. Speaker, I shall take just as little time of the House as possible. The bill has been entirely disposed of, so far as the legislative body is concerned, with the exception of this brief Senate clarifying amendment to amendment numbered 22, which is the veterans' amendment, and the Senate insists on its disagreement to changing a section number, which of course was necessary in order to get that matter disposed of.

In order that the record may be perfectly clear, let me say that I did not vote for the House amendment to the Senate amendment respecting veterans for reasons that I have stated many times and I shall not elaborate upon them now. I merely say this in passing, that I believe this amendment to be contrary to the President's position on veterans' relief.

In the last Congress we gave the President very broad powers respecting veterans' payments. That the so-called "economy bill" was in some respects too drastic, all of us agree, and the President recognizing this fact, has since the economy bill, revised the regulations in more than 50 particulars, reinstating more than $117,000,000 annually of the benefits that were taken away by the act.

The revisions were made as and when it was shown that deserving cases were not being taken care of. The provisions of the present bill as it is about to be adopted is in direct conflict with the program of the President, and as approved by the last Congress. I think the bill should have gone to a free conference. Therefore, I did not vote for the House amendment.

I did not believe it was the best way to ultimately actually get further concessions for deserving veterans. With respect to that, I have not changed my mind, but when the House three times emphatically took its position on this matter, as your representative and as a conferee, I am very glad to be able to come back and say that the Senate has receded on both of these important amendments, and accepted the House provisions.

With respect to the pay-cut amendment, which, as you will recall, is the 5-and-5 proposition, 5 percent February 1 and 5 percent July 1, the Senate accepted that. The Senate very reluctantly accepted the House provision with reference to veterans, making this clarifying amendment, as they are pleased to call it, with respect to the presumptive cases. The language which they have inserted is simply this: You will recall that the so-called "Taber amendment" was the Steiwer-McCarran Senate amendment with merely little interlineations providing that, instead of the presumptive cases receiving complete restoration at 100 percent as provided in the Senate amendment, they should receive 75 percent. That amendment was naturally prepared hurriedly, and after the smoke of battle had cleared away and the legislative experts began to examine it, a question arose as to whether or not it might be possible, under a literal construction, to apply that 75-percent reduction to the direct service-connected cases, as well as the presumptive cases; and in order to avoid any such possible construction, this clarifying language was suggested.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BROWNING. The only thing which the clarifying amendment of the Senate does is to guarantee there will be no reduction to those who had been left on, under the regulations now in force, and the only thing it does is to limit it entirely to the presumptive cases for the 75-percent maximum.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is exactly my understanding of it.

Mr. BROWNING. From the standpoint of the veteran the Senate amendment is very welcome. In fact, it improves the Taber amendment to some extent.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think it does.

Mr. BROWNING. I think it is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. WOODRUM. I hope very much it will be the pleasure of the House to accept this slight modification to our amendment, which will complete the action on this bill as far as the legislative branch of the body is concerned.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Knowing the gentleman as I do, I want to speak for many of my colleagues when I say I know the gentleman is very glad to be able to bring back this generous compromise and give the veterans as much as the bill does carry.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the Speaker of this House for his courtesy to me during the past hectic days of the discussion of veterans and Government employees' pay legislation in recognizing me to make the motions to concur in the Senate amendments; and, second, I wish to thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] for the uniform courtesy he showed in yielding time to those of us who were trying to obtain concurrence in the Senate amendments for the veterans and Government employees. Both the Speaker and the gentleman from Virginia have been very fair.

UNDER THE PRESENT PARLIAMENTARY SITUATION

If I could see any advantage to the veterans or Government workers at this time in going along further with the fight to try to obtain concurrence in the Senate amendments, I would do so. I want to say that I have no regrets whatsoever for the fight that I carried on to try to obtain concurrence in the Senate amendments. I think the Senate amendments were amendments which would do justice to the underpaid Government employees and to the veterans not only of the World War but of the Spanish-American War. So I have no hesitancy in saying that at no time in the past, nor at the present, nor in the future do I expect to regret my course.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I think the RECORD should show that if it had not been for the fight so gallantly waged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] and others who assisted him, the veterans today would not be getting the 75 percent which was set up as the wall beyond which we could not go in effecting this compromise. I think the RECORD should show that.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank my good friend from Minnesota. If the bill becomes a law, the benefits which the veterans will receive will certainly be due to the fight which we put up to concur in the Senate amendments. And the Government workers will get the 5, 5, 5, which they would not have obtained if we had not made that fight.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The veterans, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE], will not get anything unless the President signs this bill, will they?

Mr. CONNERY. No. I hope the President will sign it.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, will he sign it?

Mr. CONNERY. I have no knowledge of what the President will do.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take any further time of the House. With the foregoing statement I have made, of course I expect to vote to concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

And in doing this I wish to say that I thank all the Members who stood with me in that fight for the veterans and the Government employees.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 22.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in amendment no. 23, which merely changes a section number.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia inform the House what effect this amendment has?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is merely a change of section numbers.

Mr. RANKIN. What change was made in Senate amendment 22, if any?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Senate added a clarifying amendment providing that the 75-percent reduction should not apply to direct cases.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur in Senate amendment no. 23.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM, a motion to reconsider the votes by which action was taken on the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

ROLL CALLS NOS. 113 AND 114

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I was unavoidably detained in my State and not able to be present at roll calls nos. 113 and 114. Had I been present, I would have voted "nay."

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am indeed proud and glad to have had the privilege to yield some of my time, and especially my place, on this legislative day for the bringing in of this report by the committee dealing with the veterans' problems. I am glad to add, if I may, to what the chairman of the subcommittee and our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts had to say with reference to the culmination of this great and just task, that the Republican Membership furnished a solid front in support of relief for the veterans and Government workers, and it will be worthy of note that on one vote on this important measure in the House every Republican who voted, voted in favor of the Senate amendments providing for the maximum benefit to veterans and to the Government workers.

Now, to recur to the subject we were discussing, the great tariff question, I want to say that if this bill becomes a law in spite of its unconstitutionality, it might not for that reason alone carry any destructive consequences, for sometimes good is done even in violation of the Constitution. But the enforcement of this bill will, I think, prove very destructive to business for business will still be kept in a state of uncertainty. I can see that if carried out fairly and honestly there might be some good to some persons and industries, but on the whole, the injury that will follow such an imposition upon the individual free initiative of our people will be very disastrous.

This bill provides for the enforcement of a new principle in government. Gradually for years the Executive has invaded functions of the legislative branch of government. Sometimes by surrender of power by weak legislatures or a weak Congress and quite often by the usurpation of legislative power by a selfish Executive. Not since the foundation of the Republic have we seen any President so free and ready to accept and request additional Executive power as the present incumbent. All this is done upon the theory that the country is in a terrible emergency, or that it is in line with the President's program of recovery. We are not in such an emergency as will call for any unusual interpretation of the Constitution, but the enactment of this legislation will tend to add to the confusion of that emergency.

Nobody seriously contends that the President has any program of economy now. With the national debt exceeding that of any time since the establishment of the Republic and still mounting at the rate of twenty millions per day, it is small wonder the President has forgotten his promise of last year to balance the Budget if it took all summer to do it. The cry of "Balance the Budget" is now met with a smile and dismissed as a joke much as is that other famous sentence, "He kept us out of war."

The tariff is a national policy. It is more; it is a part of the business structure of the Nation. It is the policy that represents the difference between being an agricultural province and being the greatest Nation that the world ever knew. Had we not followed this policy almost from the beginning we would yet be an agricultural nation raising food for the other nations of the world. If this policy is directly responsible for our growth, financial and material, it should not be cast aside now in our days of depression. Tried and true doctrines should not be rejected for untried theories of a few communistic intellectuals. It should not be endangered by having it placed in the hands of one individual whose party has openly opposed it for generations, although the individual members of which party have always been ready to accept its benefits in their local districts. When the tariff needs to be changed, it should be changed by its friends and not by its enemies.

I once heard Uncle Joe Cannon say that he would sooner turn his children over to a stepmother than to turn the country over to the Democrats. I am much in the same attitude when I contemplate the Democrats attempting to change the tariff laws. Every attempt at tariff legislation by the Democratic Party has proven disastrous to the Nation. We should not be lulled into discarding a well-tryed policy by pleas that we should assist the President in his recovery program, or that we are confronted with an emergency. The real reason for the desire of the President to pass this bill is that he believes that to bring into this country more imports will tend to increase our exports, which he thinks will be to our advantage. I hope that the President and his Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, are sincere in their beliefs. Secretary Hull has been an ardent opponent of the tariff through his long and distinguished career. He opposed every Republican tariff measure presented during his long service in the House and in the Senate. Should the President be guided by Secretary Hull in his negotiations for tariff agreements, it may be expected that all agreements that he might make will be in line with the philosophy of Secretary Hull. Indeed it is not unreasonable to suppose that since it will be physically impossible for the President to make these secret agreements, these agreements will be made largely through the office of the Secretary of State. If they are, you may expect an old-fashioned Grover Cleveland tariff.

How Secretary Hull can justify his championship of this bill, giving such unlimited and unconstitutional power to the President to outdo the flexible provision of the present tariff law, in the light of his vigorous former opposition to the flexible tariff, is difficult to understand. When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was under consideration Secretary Hull claimed that it was unconstitutional and that it constituted an "unjust arrogance of power and authority to the President", and that the power granted to the President was a "vast and uncontrolled power", larger than that of an aristocratic king. This bill far exceeds the flexible-tariff provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act. Will Secretary Hull follow this bill into its far outreaches or will he hark back to his lifelong tendencies toward free trade? Wait and see. Either course is dangerous.

The reasons Secretary Wallace has for supporting this measure are in line with the philosophy that controls the actions of his Department. This is the philosophy of Tugwell and Mordacai Ezekiel and of Frank and Frankfurter and all the other radicals who are leading us straight to Russian sovietism. They want a dictator. They favor regulation of agriculture. They demand cooperation through compulsion. They believe that we should buy where we can buy the cheapest. Their main idea is to destroy surplus. Their theories will Russianize America. Some of them affiliate with the Civil Liberties Union, which believes that the red flag of communism should fly above the American flag. They are internationalists. Secretary Wallace, in his pamphlet America Must Choose, says:

Revision of our tariff downward will have far better prospects if our new deal succeeds than if it fails.

Further in the same pamphlet he says:

A truly practical readjustment of our own tariff policy would involve the careful examination of every product produced in the United States or imported, and the determination of just which of our monopolistic or inefficient industries we are willing to expose to real foreign competition. This problem should be approached from the point of view of a long-time national plan which we are willing to follow for at least 20 or 30 years, even if some of our friends get hurt, and howl continuously to high heaven.

This is an augury of what to expect from Mr. Wallace if he has any part in making up the President's mind as to whether to reduce tariff rates, and there is no doubt but that he, Secretary Hull, and Secretary Roper will be the President's advisers.

If this bill becomes a law the President, who now has the power to control every business in the land, will have the power to say whose business shall be permitted to continue and whose business, according to Mr. Wallace, "will have to be retired." Can we then sing, "Long may our land be bright with freedom's holy light"? More appropriately shall we sing the song of the Soviet. My colleagues, this philosophy, if adopted, marks the beginning of the decadence of the greatest Nation that the world ever knew. Shall we break upon the shoals of communism because a lot of Communists are now holding high places in our Government? Shall we disintegrate by scattering our substance to the other nations of the world under the philosophy of internationalism? Shall we further encourage dictatorship? I say no! I should rather die with rugged individualism than to live with ragged communism. I should rather the free American citizen pass on into history as a contribution to civilization than to see him transferred into a servile subject. My friends, the question is, Shall we be free citizens or servile subjects? Mr. Wallace says America must choose. I have already chosen.

For a long time I have had no patience with the clamor that our success lies in friendly international agreements. We already have friendly international agreements that show a balance in favor of our Government of about fifteen thousand millions that we will never collect and of about twenty thousand millions that our American citizens will never collect. When these countries develop a conscience that tells them that common honesty is yet a virtue it will be plenty of time for us to make secret trade agreements with them.

For a long time I have felt that since we do one half of the business of the world with ourselves we are not so bad off. If 3 years ago our President had refused to grant a moratorium to European nations and had recommended that they themselves call a moratorium on national chicanery and dishonesty, the world would be in better shape today. We have been made puppets of by European diplomats. Europe today has recovered from the depression much faster and further than we have. As proof of this, let me read a letter that I received yesterday from a constituent of mine who is a manufacturer and business man of rare acumen:

Your circular letter of March 7, regarding the bill which Mr. Roosevelt has ordered to be introduced in Congress, giving him dictatorial powers with reference to the control of tariff rates, etc. Answer to your letter has been delayed owing to the fact that I have been absent.

I have just returned from a couple of months in England and France, where I called upon a number of firms in the same business that we are in. Strange to say, all of them were very busy, and one of the general managers volunteered the information that his firm had just finished the best year in its history.

It was interesting to me to note that apparently both of these countries are recovering industrially without the benefit of the N.R.A., limitless spending of money on public works, and numerous other panaceas in which the present administration places so much faith. The tariff is of only indirect interest to us. We do not export to any great extent and do not use any imported materials. However, we realize that the tariff is of immense importance to American industry, and we would hesitate to see Congress abdicate any more of its power.

Our duty and our opportunity is here at home. Let us quit our interference with and entrance into the business affairs of all our people and allow them once more to draw a free breath. Give the American citizen a free chance and he will demonstrate that his genius for accomplishment is superior to dictatorial edicts. If we need to make these trade agreements, why not make them through the Tariff Commission, for they will have to be made by someone for the President? Why have them made through doubtful friends of our country and in secret? Publicity is the greatest guaranty to honesty and the greatest antidote to crookedness.

In 1929 our total volume of business was $100,000,000,000. Those were the days when business was normal in all directions. At that time ninety billions of this business was done among ourselves—Americans on both ends of the deal. Ten billions was done with foreign countries, six billions in exports, and four billions in imports, 67 percent of which came in duty free—a balance of two billions in our favor. Why hamper the ninety billions just for a chance to make a small percentage of two billions. We have no fear of losing all our foreign trade. Foreigners will always want to deal in the world's largest market. There are no manufactured articles that we cannot make in America. Coffee, tea, silk, and rubber are our most necessary imports. Coffee will always be purchasable from Puerto Rico and Central and South America. Tea, silk, and rubber will always be for sale if we have the money. America can be practically self-contained.

Let us devote ourselves to a program of building up our own business. European countries are already dedicated to such a course, which accounts for our loss of foreign trade. I am not in favor of a plan of isolation. Neither do I fail to appreciate the importance of imports and exports. Still I am not in favor of scrapping the Constitution or scattering our domestic business in order to win trade from those who owe us, unless they are willing to credit it on account of the debts they owe us. We will never regain this trade. Why waste our energies in trying to regain it? Samuel Crowther, one of the Nation's greatest economists, has written a wonderful book on this and kindred subjects. I think he must have written his book before giving it a title. It is a story of the greatness and sufficiency of our great country. The title of his book is "America—Self Contained." This distinguished economist student and patriot yet thinks that American freedom and initiative should not be supplanted by enforced cooperation, regimented labor, controlled production under threat of penitentiary punishment. In his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means he says—

I have objection to this bill because it conveys broad discretionary powers upon the President without initiating a policy within which that power is to be exercised—without initiating a national policy and without any capacity for review.

With reference to the importance of a revival of our foreign trade he says—

I think we are wasting our energy. It is dead beyond the point of revival.

It has been suggested that the foreign debts are involved in this bill. It is stoutly denied by the Secretary of State and others, but Samuel Crowther maintains that it is impossible to separate them, and he says with reference to them, "This bill recognizes the worthlessness", meaning the worthlessness of the debt. In his book, America—Self Contained, Mr. Crowther says:

The great majority of the industrialists of the country are agreed that their possible foreign business is of slight consequence as compared with the future of the home market.

If the President is not expecting to carry out the plan of Secretary Wallace to eliminate the inefficient industries, there is absolutely no reason for the passage of this bill. If he is expecting to carry it out, then the bill should be passed. If he is to act upon the facts found for him by a governmental agency, he already has the most efficient agency at his command—the Tariff Commission. I may be too much exercised about this—I admit that I am much exercised—for I fear a surrender of this power by Congress to the Executive marks a long step in the wrong direction. To give any one man the right to annihilate one industry and to advance another is going too far. If the President is to annihilate the inefficient, how is he to determine which to annihilate? However much fault some people find with our legislative system, it is nearer to the people than any other branch of our Government. What will happen under this bill? The sugar producers will be the first to feel the iron heel of dictatorship, for Secretary Wallace has already put the sign of destruction on it. I am wondering if it will reach the pottery industry of the great State of Ohio. The greatest pottery-manufacturing section in the United States, if not in the world, centers in Ohio. In fact, many great industrial, financial, agricultural, commercial, and moral organizations and movements center in that great empire known as "Ohio." The following figures show the production of pottery in the past few years: 1929, 30,000,000 dozen, valued at $33,500,000; 1930, 25,000,000 dozen, valued at $27,500,000; 1931, 20,000,000 dozen, valued at $23,300,000; 1932, 17,000,000 dozen, valued at $16,300,000; 1933, 19,194,948 dozen.

This industry employs about 20,000 men in normal times. Mr. Dowsing, testifying before the committee, testified that he represented the Pottery Manufacturers Association and that they opposed this bill, maintaining that it carried very many dangerous possibilities to the pottery business. The pottery business in the United States is a perfect illustration of a domestic business. No pottery made in the United States is exported. It is impossible for American manufacturers to compete with the cheap foreign labor. The American product is equal to the product of any country in quality. If the tariff is reduced on pottery, the American pottery industry will be ruined. At the present time the pottery industry requires a 75-percent to 85-percent duty protection in order to compete with foreign manufacturers. The pottery industry is not asking for an embargo against pottery from England, France, Germany, and other European countries, but it is asking for a duty that equals the difference in cost of production. But if a duty were placed high enough to keep out Japanese goods, it would amount to an embargo against European pottery, for Japan with its cheap labor can make cups and saucers for 10 or 12 cents per dozen which would cost three or four times that much here. The only way to control Japanese importations of pottery is by a quota. Now, if those industries that cannot compete with Japanese cheap labor are to be considered as inefficient and are marked for annihilation, then the pottery industry in the United States had as well give up the ghost. This is a most appropriate illustration of what may happen. Suppose Secretary Wallace and his communistic cohorts and Secretary Hull and his free-trade cohorts can see where it would be greatly to the advantage of the cotton producers of the South to trade their cotton for Japanese silk and pottery, and for the farmers to trade their lard and meats and grains to Japan for cheap tile, brick, and pottery, what is to prevent them from doing so? If they mean to carry out this plan, the pottery and clay-products business offers as good an opportunity as any other. Of course my people in Ohio would raise a tremendous objection; but, as we are a great Republican State and as this is a great protected industry, we are in poor position to demand that we escape the executioner's ax. I hope it will not fall on this industry but it may do so, and that is one good and sufficient reason why I am against it. I cite this illustration the better to show the people of my State what dangerous possibilities this bill contains.

I may be too much exercised about this. I admit I am much exercised. How is he to do it, this President or any future President who is called upon to select the inefficient? It is a very difficult task to perform.

However much fault some people find with our legislative system, it is nearer to the people than any other branch of our Government.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would rather not yield until I have completed the main part of my speech.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I wish to ask a question right in this connection.

The representative of the pottery industry said he asked for an embargo.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No; I beg to differ with the gentleman from Washington in that respect. I read his testimony very carefully. He said he did not ask for an embargo against European countries, but if they were to deal with Japan they must have an embargo. Why? He said because in Japan they make these articles so cheaply it would take at least a 300-percent tariff to meet Japanese competition.

Were our President to sit in at a reciprocal trade conference with Japan, what would Japan ask to trade? Pottery. And should the President make such a deal with Japan, then it is good-bye to the pottery industry of my State, which does an annual business of over $33,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, it is a serious proposition to the pottery industry of my State; and to the gentleman from West Virginia, who is listening so attentively, I will say it is a serious proposition to West Virginia. It is a great industry, but it has been put on the trading block, and nobody in it has any heart to proceed; nobody has any heart to expand his business, because it is on the trading block; it is going to be talked about when the Japanese envoys get around the table with the President of the United States, as the gentleman from Tennessee says; and if they say it is an inefficient industry, such as Secretary Wallace talks about, then it is good-bye to the pottery industry of Ohio.

You can go down to the 10-cent store now, if you want, and buy pottery made in Japan by cheap labor for 10 cents a dozen. You can buy them much cheaper than we can make them here. No manufacturer in the United States can compete with Japan on cheap pottery. What applies to the pottery business may just as well apply to any other industry that is protected by a tariff.

Now, I must proceed. I have many other reasons I could assign why I am opposed to this bill.

To summarize my opposition to this bill:

First. The passage of this bill is not necessary, for the benefits that might accrue under it can be secured under the present tariff organization.

Second. It is unconstitutional.

Third. The amount of imports in normal times is only about 3 or 4 percent of the goods consumed in the United States, and 67 percent of those are on the free list.

Fourth. We do one half of the business of the world in the United States, and all nations are glad to deal with us and send their surplus to the greatest market in the world.

Fifth. Our concern should be greater for the ninety or ninety-five billions in business done among ourselves than the five or ten billions done with all the rest of the world.

Sixth. No further grant of power should be given to the President. Republics are ruled by the people and not by dictators.

Seventh. Protective tariff is largely responsible for the growth of the Nation. It is a Republican policy. It has been opposed by the Democrats. It should not be changed by its enemies.

Eighth. Increase of imports does not relieve unemployment in our country.

Ninth. It is un-American for any one man to have the authority to say that any certain industry must be annihilated and that certain other industries should be encouraged and expanded. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, H.R. 8430 has for its object the granting of authority to the President to make foreign-trade agreements by increasing or decreasing, not to exceed more than 50 percent, existing tariff rates for the purpose of expanding our foreign markets and establishing and maintaining a better relationship with foreign nations, for the benefit of agriculture, industry, and commerce.

During the entire history of our Nation there has always been a great diversity of opinion among the followers of the Democratic and Republican Parties as to the best procedure affecting imports or tariffs. I have heard it contended that the Democratic Party was never for a tariff and that we were "free-traders." As a matter of fact, in the early history of our Government, and for the first 50 years of its existence, at a time when democracy was ruling this Nation, building the cornerstones and laying the foundations upon which our great structure was builded, our party stood for a tariff. It threw its arms of protection around the infant industries in order that they might develop and not be crushed by foreign wealthy powers. This continued until this child grew to full manhood and became rich and omnipotent. At this time it was discovered that the protected industries were coming to the Congress demanding and receiving a protection for their own personal gain, and that it was necessary to protect the public as against these selfish interests. It was then that the Republican Party took up their battle and gave to industry a greater protection, culminating in the Smoot-Hawley-Grundy tariff law.

When this tariff bill of 1930 was pending President Hoover, in his message, stated that there were a few revisions that should be made, and Speaker Longworth, in his opening address of that session, declared that there were very few changes that should be made. No sooner had the committee started its work than these financiers, rich omnipotent protected industries, began to exert their influence, and, as a result, they enacted the most outrageous high protective tariff ever known in the history of the Nation. During its pendency over 40 of the leading nations of the world protested and begged that the law be not enacted. They held their hands up in holy horror, and at last declared if such a law were passed barring their goods from American markets, that they would pass retaliatory laws. As a result, nations that scarcely knew what it was to collect an import duty not only passed high-tariff laws but established embargoes, prohibitions, and quotas which were prohibitive as against America, a simple example being that the tariff on a Ford car in France is as much as the purchase price in this country. American industries established branches and others established industries in Canada and foreign countries in order to avoid the embargoes and tariffs imposed on American goods.

We are a surplus-producing nation, both in agriculture and in industry, and being barred on the foreign markets and unable to dispose of our surplus, it accumulated here at home, causing a financial panic and a depression never known in the history of our Nation. Farmers were unable to sell their products and could not buy from the local merchants, the local merchants could not buy from the wholesalers, and the wholesalers from the factories. Thus these industries ceased to operate, their men were thrown out of employment, they were unable to meet their obligations, like the farmers; bank failures and bankruptcy appeared on every hand and the poor and laboring class of people numbered 13,000,000 of unemployed, resulting, for the first time, in this Nation being required to feed and clothe its people at Federal expense. All of which was due to this outrageous Smoot-Hawley robber tariff law, engineered by Grundy, of Pennsylvania, who contended that no one but the manufacturers who had contributed money to the Republican campaign funds should have any voice in the matter.

It is a striking illustration that agriculture and industry should go hand in hand. When the farmer fails to prosper and has no money with which to buy, industry suffers. By reason of these high tariff walls existing in foreign countries in retaliation and as a punishment for the Smoot-Hawley law, we have not attempted to amend that law, because we can accomplish no good by so doing. Unless there are radical changes made by foreign-trade agreements, we will probably never in our lives see another general tariff law enacted. Still there are some of our Republican colleagues today, in a half-hearted way, defending this law, notwithstanding the fact that it has been overwhelmingly repudiated at the hands of the American electorate. They constitute the remnants of the old Hoover regime which would not give a dime to feed or clothe the poor of the Nation, which they ridiculed as a dole, but relented to loan money to buy feed for the jackasses. It is interesting to note that Senator Smoot, Senator Grundy, and Representative Hawley were immediately retired to the shades of quiet and peaceful domestic life. One half of the former Republicans of this Nation deserted their party at the last election as a retaliation, due to conditions brought about by this tariff law, which further protected industry and the unjust accumulation of wealth into the hands of a few. Labor never received its portion of protection. The protection went not into labor or the Federal Treasury, but into the swollen pockets of wealth. If labor received this protection and we can live unto ourselves, why the panic and national calamity?

Prior to 1930 we were exporting $5,000,000,000 annually of our surplus, 40 percent being agricultural and 60 percent industrial. Last year our exports were approximately $1,000,000,000. Our imports in 1929 were $368,000,000, while in 1933 they were $96,000,000. We cannot expect to have an export trade without a considerable import trade. It is absolutely imperative that something be done to expand our foreign trade and dispose of our surplus.

This measure represents a Democratic remedy. The Republicans have no remedy, but are still wedded to their golden calf, the high protective tariff. We cannot stand still, we must either go forward or backward. It is impossible for us to operate under our tariff laws under present conditions. It takes about 6 months to have hearings and obtain a ruling, raising, or lowering the tariff under the flexible provision. Practically all the nations of continental Europe, as well as England and many of the Latin American countries, have vested authority in the executive branch of their governments to negotiate duties below those in their tariff schedules in the course of reciprocal negotiations with other countries. In many countries this executive authority goes so far as to make changes over night. This means that we stand no chance for restoration of our lost markets without being able to deal quickly. Certainly the Congress cannot make these negotiations. International commerce conducted on a fair, mutual, and profitable basis, such as contemplated in this bill, is calculated to add materially in the restoration of prosperity and serve as a great civilizer and peacemaker. The question today is what are we going to do to regain our foreign trade? We know we have lost it and we must set up some agency to regain it. All the other nations of the world are making reciprocal commercial agreements between one another. We are doing practically nothing because of a lack of authority. I was startled to hear my Republican colleague [Mr. JENKINS of Ohio], just preceding me, make the same remark he and other Republican committee members have advanced. "It is no use to worry about our foreign markets, as they are gone never to be regained." Is such Republican political propaganda sound or reasonable? The purpose of this bill is to vest authority in the President to set up an agency through the Secretary of State to break down the barriers, go into the open markets and create a demand for our surplus. It may sound good for our Republican colleagues to preach isolation, to contend that we can build a Chinese wall around our Nation and live by ourselves. This is probably true. The Indians used to do so, but if we expect to keep step in the march of time and to prosper in the future, as we have in the past, we cannot live unto ourselves, but must trade and exchange goods with our neighbors.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DARDEN. Would we not sacrifice 60 percent of the cotton trade of the world? Sixty percent of our cotton moves abroad. Unless we are to develop our foreign markets, have we not of necessity got to give that trade up?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly.

FOR WHAT DO WE TRADE?

The minority members in the committee and here on the floor of the House have insisted on wanting to know what specific articles we expect to barter or trade. Seeking, of course, to get someone to specify an article which is grown or manufactured in this country with a view of advancing the further argument that the object of the bill is to destroy American industry. They seek not relief from the condition they brought about but political advantage. The answer is, We expect to deal, swap, and trade, and make reciprocal agreements concerning things which come to this country in exchange for our surpluses, the same as we did before the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. If David Harum were alive and figuring on making a horse swap with the deacon, he would not let everyone know the procedure he would follow nor the tactics he would resort to in making a swap. Neither is it good public policy, nor in keeping with his position, for Secretary of State Hull, who will have this matter in charge, to let the nations of the world know in answering questions before the committee as to what articles he expected to barter and trade. Such a procedure would forewarn the other nations. It is no trouble to conceive of thousands of articles that we could make reciprocal agreements concerning, to be imported and sold in this country, in exchange for our surplus manufactured and agricultural products. Forty-eight nations of the world are busily engaged in entering into these kind of agreements. It is not a matter of retaliation with us, but a matter of self-defense. Under this bill we can develop a stable situation with regard to a foreign market.

With the rapid changes in the tariffs, embargoes, exchange restrictions, and quotas, no business man knows how to plan ahead. He is afraid to ship a cargo to a foreign market without a reciprocal trade agreement with that nation, fearing when his cargo arrives there would be an embargo or such restrictions that he would lose his shipment.

It either means that foreign purchasing power for agricultural surpluses be restored or that we continue with the present emergency and undesirable task of retiring surplus acres and the imposition of processing taxes.

THE DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY

It is contended by many of our Republican colleagues that this bill is unconstitutional for the reason it delegates authority to the President to levy taxes, which authority, under the Constitution, is vested in the Congress. This measure carries no such authority. It simply authorizes the President, probably acting through the Secretary of State, to act as an instrumentality to carry out our tariff law with power to raise or lower tariffs, the same as is now vested in the Tariff Commission. It is not a delegated authority. Under the Smoot-Hawley tariff law the President now has practically the last word in tariff questions to the extent of 50 percent. He names the Tariff Commission, and it is reasonable to conclude that if he wants the tariff raised or lowered 50 percent, as now authorized under the law, that he would be able to carry out his purpose. The contention that leading Democratic statesman contended the Smoot-Hawley law was unconstitutional because it vested authority in the President and the Tariff Commission to raise or lower the tariff does not rise to the dignity of an argument for the unconstitutionality of this measure. This is an emergency measure and no one contemplates or desires that it shall be a permanent law. Since the creation of our Government authority in numerous instances has been vested in our Chief Executive by Congress to enter into various reciprocal trade agreements without reporting and receiving the approval of the Senate.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE

It is natural, if only for political purposes, that our Republican colleagues would be opposed to any measure that we proposed affecting the tariff. But how a Democratic Member can oppose this measure is more than I can comprehend. Their argument must be based wholly and entirely upon a lack of confidence in our President. Of course, he cannot make all of the agreements; but it is fair to conclude that he will know the substance of every agreement he approves. Some of the representatives of the sugar industry are skeptical and fearful that he will ruin their industry. In my opinion, such a fear is wholly unfounded. Personally, I am in favor of a reasonable and fair protection of this industry; but if they are entirely inefficient and living and prospering at the expense of the consuming public, they have no right to complain, nor has any other industry that is wholly inefficient. Certainly its friends will not concede the sugar industry is inefficient. This Government does not levy a tax and pass it on to the consumer to take care of the professional, business, and agricultural interests; and no industry has a right to exact that it should be maintained at the expense of the taxpayers.

I represent the greatest tomato-canning industry in America, situated in the Ozark Mountains. This area cans one third of all the tomatoes consumed in America. It could be driven out of business and into the hands of bankruptcy in 30 days if Italy were permitted to ship unrestricted canned tomatoes into this country. But I have no fear of our great leader crippling this industry. He has demonstrated by his entire program that his main and first object is to restore agriculture. Agriculture need have no fear of trade agreements being entered into that will permit other nations to ship their goods here in competition. In my opinion, instead of injuring the manufacturing industries, it will be of untold value. No one in this House would be in favor of adding an additional burden during these trying and panicky times to striving agriculture, business, and industry.

This is not a jump in the dark; it is a conservative measure, to be executed by the world's greatest statesman. Let us not be doubting Thomases and stand still, groping in the dark; but, rather, let us present a solid phalanx with a firm determination that we will back our President in this worthy undertaking to restore peace and prosperity to this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] as he may desire.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering an amendment to the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill of 1930, which is H.R. 8667. This bill does not go as far as I had hoped it would. I was hopeful that a general tariff bill would be brought in by the Committee on Ways and Means, which would give us a chance to revise and lower many tariff schedules which we believe should be lowered.

A tariff bill should not be written in haste, as we all know, because it requires careful study for each item. What we need is a well-balanced tariff, which will not aid a privileged class to the detriment of the masses.

The tariff bill of 1930 is the highest ever written, and it has had the effect of driving away from us our foreign trade, which we enjoyed for so many years and will enjoy again when this question is settled right. When the Smoot-Hawley bill was passed, it built, as it were, a wall around the United States so high that other nations could not trade with us. Other nations are thinking for themselves just like we are, and have passed retaliatory measures against us, and as a result of the legislation on both sides we have been standing here idle counting our fingers, for we had no money to count, and other nations have been doing the same thing.

This bill seeks to tear down that barrier and give the power to make reciprocal trade agreements with any country we may desire to, by reducing our tariff not exceeding 50 percent and they reducing theirs the same. If we can induce a few of the large nations to enter into this kind of agreement, we shall never again have a surplus of anything. If the world were properly fed and properly clothed, we would have no surplus. The trouble now is we are in need of everything and nothing to buy with. The purchasing power must be restored or our people will continue to suffer.

The manufacturing interests have always been protected with a high tariff, and the man who produces the raw material is forced to sell on a market which is not protected at whatever he can get for it, and then buy what he has to buy on a market that is protected. Almost everything a man uses from the cradle to the grave is protected by a high tariff. A farmer will raise a 4-year-old beef steer, butcher it, take the hide to town, and sell it to one man; he will then go across the street and buy a pair of hame strings, and the tariff put on leather makes them so high it takes practically all he got for the whole beef hide to pay for the two hame strings. The same is true with practically everything we have to buy.

Much has been said about giving too much power to one man as President. I agree with that line of thought, but much depends on who is President. I am sure the present President, Mr. Roosevelt, will not abuse this power in the least but that he will use it to help pull us out of the dilemma we found ourselves in on the 4th of last March. Too much cannot be said in praise of our great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt. He admits that he, as well as anyone else, will make mistakes when trying emergency measures to pull us out of the distressing conditions we had drifted into. It is far better to try and not succeed than to fail to try and let humanity suffer.

The President, addressing the Congress, speaking of the decline in world trade, said:

Measured in terms of the volume of goods in 1933, it has been reduced to approximately 70 percent of its 1929 volume; measured in terms of dollars, it has fallen to 35 percent.

The Secretary of State, in his testimony before the committee March 8, 1934, said:

According to reliable estimates, if world trade had gone forward with the annual ratio of gain existing before the war, the nations during the intervening years would have had some $275,000,000,000 more than they have actually enjoyed. And according to these estimates, if world trade had thus progressed there would be today an annual international commerce of near $50,000,000,000 instead of the pitiable figures of less than $12,000,000,000 for 1933.

International trade has steadily grown less each year since 1929. The reduction of international trade in the amount of $40,000,000,000 means the reduction of world production by $40,000,000,000, and this means a reduction in consumption of a like amount and this means correspondingly lower standards of living.

President Roosevelt in his message to Congress stated:

Other governments are to an ever-increasing extent winning their share of international trade by negotiated, reciprocal trade agreements. If American agricultural and industrial interests are to retain their deserved place in this trade, the American Government must be in a position to bargain for that place with other governments by rapid and decisive negotiation based upon a carefully considered program and to grant with discernment corresponding opportunities in the American market for foreign products supplementary to our own.

If the American Government is not in a position to make fair offers for fair opportunities, its trade will be superseded. If it is not in a position at a given moment rapidly to alter the terms on which it is willing to deal with other countries, it cannot adequately protect its trade against discriminations and against bargains injurious to its interests. Furthermore, a promise to which prompt effect cannot be given is not an inducement which can pass current at par in commercial negotiations.

For this reason, any smaller degree of authority in the hands of the Executive would be ineffective. The executive branches of virtually all other important trading countries already possess some such power.

We must safeguard our export industries. If the United States is to regain prosperity and not sacrifice large and important agricultural and commercial interests which give employment to millions of the workers of the country, it must sell certain of its surplus products abroad. As stated by the President in his message to Congress:

Important branches of our agriculture, such as cotton, tobacco, hog products, rice, cereals, and fruit raising, and those branches of American industry whose mass-production methods have led the world, will find expanded opportunities and productive capacity in foreign markets and will thereby be spared, in part at least, the heartbreaking readjustments that must be necessary if the shrinkage of American foreign commerce remains permanent.

The main purpose of the bill is to build up foreign trade. Section 350 (a) reads as follows:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds that the existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States or that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the use of the powers herein conferred, is authorized from time to time—

(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly, except that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the granting of exclusive preferential treatment to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Republic of Cuba: Provided, That the President may suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which in his opinion tend to defeat the purposes set forth in this section; and the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation. The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

(b) As used in this section, the term "duties and other import restrictions" includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions, other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports.

Let us pass this bill; and if the tariff is not corrected, then let us rewrite the tariff bill and make it just and fair to all men. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL].

Mr. BAKEWELL. There is no dispute as to the desirability of the revival and expansion of international trade in the interest both of agriculture and of industry. There is no doubt a sense in which America can be regarded as the greatest—perhaps the only free-trade nation in the world—since we have absolute freedom of trade between the 48 sovereign States, many of which compare favorably in size and wealth, in diversification of activities, and even in population, with independent nations situated in other parts of the globe. If any nation can stand economic isolation, we can. We consume more than 90 percent of what we produce, and our home markets must be preserved at all cost. Nevertheless, if so confined, the restoration of normal conditions at home would bring a prosperity so far below that which we formerly enjoyed, and which we hope to recover, as to satisfy no one. William McKinley himself, the arch apostle of protection, said more than 30 years ago that "the period of exclusiveness is past." He recognized the necessity of finding foreign markets for our surplus products, and advocated a broad and enlightened policy of commercial expansion. That has been good Republican doctrine from that day to this. And it is equally good Republican doctrine that one method of furthering that end is through reciprocal trade arrangements with other nations, which can and should be accomplished without compromising the principle of protection. The Republican platform in 1900 contained this plank:

We favor the . . . policy of reciprocity so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

It is not contrary to Republican policy even to advocate certain reductions in tariff rates in the interest of trade expansion, where changed conditions of relative cost of production make this possible without involving unfair and ruinous competition. Unfortunately this pathway is pretty effectively barred by the increased cost of production under the codes of the N.R.A. European and Asiatic goods, made with long hours of work, low wages, often sweatshop conditions, are even now leaping over our tariff walls, flooding us with foreign-made goods, and threatening the existence of many of our industries. If it is desirable for American industry to be protected from cutthroat competition at home, it is most assuredly right that it should be protected from cutthroat competition of foreign manufacturers.

It is also recognized by the Members on both sides of the House, excepting only the silver bloc, that the development of international trade is conditioned, in the last analysis, by the exchange of goods and services for goods and services. This is true, subject only to the limitation that the amount received by citizens of other lands for their investments in American securities in excess of the amount received by Americans for investments abroad and the amounts spent by American tourists abroad in excess of the amount spent by foreign tourists in this country must be taken into the reckoning.

Finally, the principle of a flexible tariff, permitting the changing or rates within limits by the President under definite conditions imposed by Congress, is a Republican contribution to tariff policy. But note that the President, under the present tariff law, relying on the results reached by a fact-finding nonpartisan Commission, is merely authorized to carry out the expressed will of Congress by changing rates to meet changed relative costs of production so as to maintain fair and reasonable competition.

This bill proposes something totally different. There are no conditions imposed; there is no fact-finding body involved. The President is not instructed to carry out the will of Congress, but is authorized to follow his own sweet will. He is given absolute power of life and death over our industries. There can be no doubt as to the intention of the administration.

Mr. Wallace, whose bill this is, let the cat out of the bag during the hearings on this measure. Here is one passage among many that might be quoted:

Mr. WALLACE. I think it would be quite possible to increase Germany's purchasing power for our lard. Germany, in the old days, was the leading consumer of American lard. Germany today has a tariff of 16 cents a pound on lard, which is nearly three times the present price of lard in this country. Lard is an important product to your State and to my State. I think we should increase Germany's purchasing power for lard very materially in case we import a normal quantity of German goods.

Mr. KNUTSON. What would we bring in from Germany?

Mr. WALLACE. Germany has a large number of small industries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are they efficient?

Mr. WALLACE. They seem to be more efficient than our own; they are willing to sell at lower prices. The Germans are undoubtedly able to sell toys for less than our people are able to sell toys.

Here is the yardstick that is to be used. Willingness to sell at lower prices is the mark of superior efficiency. If that is a sound doctrine, why should not the cutthroat competitor, working with child labor and under sweatshop conditions, be declared the efficient producer? If this yardstick is used, there is scarcely anything that we make that Japan cannot produce and sell, even after paying transportation and tariff charges, for less than our people can sell similar articles. She can produce more cheaply because she has all our latest machinery and because she pays starvation wages and exacts long hours of toil.

The application of the principle enunciated by Mr. Wallace would threaten nearly all of our industries. They are having a hard battle to keep going as it is. They cannot stand the uncertainty this bill will create. The President is here authorized to act without the check of any impartial nonpartisan fact-finding body, and without granting a hearing to the industries affected. Our industries cannot stand it to have this sword of Damocles hanging, always hanging, over their heads.

If industry is dependent on the prosperity of the farmer, it is at least equally true that the farmer is dependent on the prosperity of industry. How long, how long will it be before we take to heart the simple truth that there can be no real recovery, no enduring reemployment, until industry is given a chance to thrive and prosper?

But there is an even greater menace in the bill under consideration. Congress in the special session granted the President vast powers on the pretext that they were war-time emergency powers, and with the understanding that they were temporary in character and would soon be relinquished. But the lust for power is an appetite that grows by what it feeds on. The President's demands now know no limit. This Congress, abjectly surrendering to his dictatorship, has enormously extended his powers through the $2,000,000,000 currency and credit control bill and the cotton control bill. This bill represents the culminating effort to wrest from Congress its last remaining vestige of power. We have no right to surrender this power. To do so would be a direct violation of our oath to uphold the Constitution. I have excellent authority for this statement. When the bill was under consideration, 5 years ago, which proposed to give the President the right to modify rates, although that power was merely to carry out the expressed purpose of Congress, our Democratic statesmen were up in arms. Here is what one of them said, speaking from the other end of the Capitol:

I should like to read a few of the statements of these gentlemen, statements which have not as yet appeared in this discussion, but, asking unanimous consent to include them in the RECORD, in order to save time, I shall press on.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAINES). The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Listen to this from a distinguished statesman at the other end of the Capitol, October 1, 1929, page 4094:

Senator WAGNER. After the Tariff Commission has made an investigation and recommended a change in duty, who is to enact that recommendation into law? The President takes the position that he alone is competent to act with the necessary dispatch to afford adequate relief. It is my view that if a new duty is to become effective, if a greater tax burden is to be imposed upon the people of the United States, the change must secure both congressional and Presidential approval, as in the case of the enactment of every other law. The issue is not between a flexible and an inflexible tariff; the true line of division is between an Executive tariff and a congressional tariff.

Here is the statement of another eminent Democrat, also made at the other end of the Capitol, October 1, 1929, page 4106:

Senator WALSH of Massachusetts. Gentlemen, you are engaged in an assault upon parliamentary government. No one can foresee where this movement will lead or end. One thing is certain: It risks the beginning of the end of that fundamental principle upon which our institutions were built, our happiness secured, and our prosperity maintained up to the present hour. This proposed change would not even be thought of except it is the fashion of the time to belittle and discredit parliamentary government. But the tragedy of it all is that we ourselves are joining in the movement to undermine parliamentary government, which means to put ourselves in the limbo of rejected things.

And here is a gem from Texas, October 1, 1929, pages 4101 and 4102:

Senator SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States provides that all legislative powers granted by its terms shall be vested in Congress.

Congress cannot relieve itself, therefore, of the legislative function without violating the Constitution, the instrument which every Member of the two Houses of Congress has sworn to support and to defend.

It would be difficult to imagine a more serious question than the one before us.

It is the question of whether we are about to delegate a legislative power to the President of the United States.

What is that power?

The life and death of many industries, the welfare of multitudes of men, women, and children would be made to depend on the will or the mood of one man—perhaps on what he ate for breakfast.

The Constitution makes Congress the sole legislative instrumentality. Not only does it vest the law-making power in Congress, but it goes further and specifically ordains that Congress shall levy duties.

The proposal under debate substitutes the President for Congress in the matter of levying duties within limits alarmingly wide. Tariff taxes touch humanity at every step from infancy to dissolution. The power to tax is the power to destroy.

The proposal confronting us clothes the President with legislative power.

It merges the Capitol into the White House.

It deposits the dead body of a suicide Congress at the feet of Herbert Hoover.

The measure under consideration enables the President to make law—to legislate.

It destroys so far as its operation is concerned one of the most vital features of our system of free government—the separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial functions.

Mr. Chairman, ancient civilization rested upon slave labor. Aristotle, the greatest intellect that ever lived, in defending this institution said that if there had been no slavery there would have been no leisure, and without leisure there could have been no civilization. But, he added, with prophetic vision: "If only the shuttle could weave without the hand to guide it, there would be no necessity for slave labor."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Connecticut 7 additional minutes.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Now the shuttle does weave without the hand to guide it. Science and invention have made such tremendous strides, have given us such complete control over the forces of nature, that now it is possible for the first time in history for all men to live in freedom and with leisure and be able to enjoy and contribute to the blessings of civilization; but, Mr. Chairman, these developments have come with such bewildering rapidity that we are in danger of being overwhelmed by our very victories over nature and nature's forces. Selfishness and greed have not been slow to seize their opportunity; folly has done its share; and chaos has resulted. It is necessary to bring order out of chaos, and this can only be done by finding a better balance between production and consumption, a better distribution, a more even-handed justice; but this itself would be of little value if it were purchased at the price of the loss of our liberty and of that individual independence and initiative which constitute our most precious heritage.

When this administration came into power we had hopes that we were to have a leadership which would find the way out while still preserving our liberties, but as the months have rolled on, huge bureaucracies have been piled on huge bureaucracies, measure after measure has been sent down and ordered passed, measures which show that we are being pushed more and more to the left. It is becoming increasingly evident that the political philosophy underlying these measures is not that of our fathers, not the philosophy of Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln. It is an alien political philosophy, sired in Germany and damned in Russia.

If we follow this through to its logical end, we shall find that just at the time when we might all have been free we shall all be in chains, living under a completely regimented system.

The President in a recent speech said that he was sometimes amused and sometimes sad over such suggestions. It would be well if he were to take to heart his own counsel when he said, "We must think things through." It were well if he would take a few days off and think through to the bitter end the implications of some of these measures that have had their origin in brain storms of the visionaries who constitute the kitchen-brains cabinet of this administration. It is high time to call a halt. Here and now is the appointed place and time.

If you continue to follow along the path you are now following, you will find in the end that you have sold our birthright of freedom for a mess of communist pottage, and this period of our history, which started out with a promise so fair, shall be known in history as the era of the great betrayal.

You gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House are on record with respect to your own opinion on these matters. You cannot go back on those opinions. If you were honest then, you must still believe those things to be true.

Mention has been made of coming elections. If you continue to vote simply under orders, turning yourselves into a herd of dumb, unreasoning cattle that understand no language but the crack of the whip, if you are fearful of getting on the Speaker's blacklist and losing administration support in the coming election, you will vote for this measure; but if you use your judgment, you will vote against it, unless you were insincere in what you said a few years ago. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I listened with marked attention to the brilliant speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], in the House on Saturday last, against the pending bill (H.R. 8687) granting tariff powers to the President, and also read his speech in the RECORD.

It is always an education to listen to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I doubt whether any Member of either House is his match in the discussion of constitutional law, embellished with a wealth of parliamentary history, and adorned with a felicity and eloquence of expression which always make it a pleasure to listen to him.

This is not in the nature of a reply. I am only a very humble self-made member of the profession of which he has long been one of the national leaders. I have neither the knowledge of constitutional law nor of history, requisite to a reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Even if I had these qualifications, my viewpoint would not permit me to dispute his claims regarding the great change which has been wrought in government in the United States in the last 50 years, converting it, to quote him, "from a federation of States into a unitary socialistic State." My answer would be in the nature of a confession and avoidance. I would say that these things have been and are because they had to be. I would plead that what has happened to the Constitution was only incidental to what has happened to the economic life of America.

He begins with the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887 as a manifest point of departure from the old constitutional distribution of powers between the Federal and State Governments, followed by the creation of the Department of Agriculture in 1888 and the Sherman antitrust law in 1890, and following on down to the present program, which for the time being is virtually submerging the State in the scheme of American Government.

The situation is proof of the axiom that "necessity knows no law." One sentence in the Constitution, the power given Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States", now outweighs the rest of the Constitution. It is difficult to believe that the framers of the Constitution ever anticipated the interpretations which have been placed on the commerce clause. It is quite likely that as the gentleman from Pennsylvania states, this power was intended to prevent intermeddling by the States against each other. For the sake of argument, let us admit the gentleman's whole case down to and including his observations on the recent milk decision by the Supreme Court, in which he states that "the Court proceeded to reconcile the acts of Congress with an extraordinary latitudinarian interpretation of the Constitution", and let us direct a brief inquiry into the proposition whether history and experience hold out any hope that a government of the people might carry on and liberty survive the transformations being wrought in the structure and functions of government.

I find some hope in the reflections aroused in my mind while reading the speech. The gentleman properly referred to England as the "mother of parliaments." The British Parliament was necessarily the model from which the framers of the American Constitution build, although with substantial modifications. But he could not have referred to England as the mother of constitutions, because England has no written constitution.

At this point my mind recalled the only effort I made while in Congress many years ago, which attracted any considerable mention. It was a speech based upon President Taft's veto of the resolution admitting Arizona to statehood, because of the radical nature of its constitution.

In that speech I pointed out that the British executive had not exercised the veto power in 250 years. I also pointed out that the British courts had no power to hold invalid an act of Parliament. At this time I want to add that the British House of Lords cannot reject an act passed three successive times by the House of Commons. It appears, therefore, that the oldest, most substantial and successful democracy in the world carries on without the distribution or even the existence of governmental powers which have been considered fundamental by a people not inherently different than their forebears, the American people.

One further point of difference between the British and American systems may be noted at this time and that is that the Commons, the latest addition in point of time to the British structure of government, has become the head of the system. The last is first. The House of Commons, elected by the people, through its ministry, governs the British Empire. It rules kings, lords, and courts. It is supreme.

In the American system the counterpart of the House of Commons—that is, the House of Representatives—was intended by the framers of the Constitution to occupy in our scheme of government the position now occupied by the British Commons. The Constitution vested in it the power to control the purse strings, which means the control of government. If the House of Representatives does not now occupy the high station contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, I want to point out that it is not, like the Constitution, the victim of changes wrought by the law-making power. The law creating and empowering Congress stands as originally written, except for amendments adopted by the people on its initiation. But the Congress has suffered, and I now speak of it as one of the three coordinate branches of government embracing both Houses. It has become subordinated to the Executive, far subordinated. It does not enjoy that place in the popular esteem held by another coordinate branch, the Supreme Court. And as between the two bodies of the legislative branch, the popular branch has become the lesser. Therefore, in the American scheme of government, the first is last. The House, it is true, still enjoys the power of initiation in matters of raising revenue, but the right of amendment and the exercise of that right by the other body makes it only a right of initiation. There is no comparison between the powers of the House of Commons and the House of Representatives.

This, however, is not the main question. The main question is the status of the Congress as a whole. A question mark has been placed behind it. The question is whether it is not outmoded and overloaded, whether it is not in the same category with the Constitution and from the same causes.

I read a statement made by Thomas A. Edison some years ago, of which I cannot quote the text, but the substance was that the structure of modern civilization had become so weighty and complex that the human mind was not capable of sustaining it and that the whole structure was in danger of a break-down.

The present bill before the House illustrates the situation. It is a bill transferring tariff powers within defined limits from the Congress to the President. It is pointed out by the Republicans that when the President was granted such powers in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, only 3 years ago, the powers of the President being conditioned on the findings of the Federal Tariff Commission, that the Democrats unanimously opposed it as a transfer of legislative powers to the Executive. Now, say the Republicans, opposing this bill, the Democrats are proposing to vest this power in the President directly. Both are right. The power vested in the President by the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, through the agency of the Federal Tariff Commission, was, like the original creation of the Commission itself, a recognition of the fact that the Congress, overburdened as it is with multitudes of great new questions, could no longer deal with the vast complexities and intricacies of tariff legislation. Both parties have been borne along on the same stream. These powers had to be handed over to a commission created to exercise them.

It is now recognized that in the rapidly fluxing tariff changes of the world, we cannot even await the slow action of a Commission. Foreign tariffs change overnight.

And what is true of the tariff is true of transportation, of communication, of the banking and monetary systems, of internal revenue, of internal improvements, of the entire recovery program, and of every major national policy. The utmost that the Congress can do, and do intelligently, is to lay down policies and define limits, and it is difficult even to find time to do this.

In the old days the problems of government were few and political, now they are many and are economic and sociological. The former school of statesmanship has passed out. This is the day of the economist and sociologist. I am only able to apprehend this situation, not to meet it. Parliaments and constitutions are in the crucible. Whatever happens to them, humanity, liberty, and progress will survive. Even if this be a revolution, it is only a passing phase. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to feel that the main purpose of this bill is to enter into some reciprocal trade agreements for the advantage of some industry and the disadvantage of some others.

There is no question in my mind but if the administration is authorized to enter into these agreements somebody is going to be hurt. No industry in this country will be materially benefited as a result of the trade agreement, unless there is a corresponding damage to some other industry.

I have been very attentive to the debate, hoping that some gentleman will get up and state upon what commodity the tariff is to be reduced. For some reason or other we have not received much information along that line. It would seem that if the administration believes that it can effectually make trade agreements it must have in mind some particular industry that could be dealt with with material advantage to American industry without harming any other industry.

It seems to me that we should be given that information. I do not feel that we can properly act on this bill without receiving information from the administration as to what commodities it is intended to revise the tariff schedules. In the absence of such information, I for one cannot support this bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Gladly.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is a progressive, is he?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does not the gentleman realize that all of the progressive element in other countries have supported similar measures to this?

Mr. BOILEAU. I have not heard of any country so progressive that they would give us an advantage on a tariff measure.

Mr. McCORMACK. My question is whether or not the progressives of other countries have not supported similar measures?

Mr. BOILEAU. Some progressives in this country have taken that attitude on this question, but I cannot agree with them.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] made a statement a little while ago to the effect that if we were to lower the tariff rates on tomatoes Italy could come in here and drive his people out of business. He said, however, in the next breath that he is sure in his own mind that our President is not going to permit his tomato industry to be ruined. Somebody will get the ax. It probably will not be the tomato industry, which is confined to some extent to the gentleman's district, but it may be the paper and pulp industry that exists in my district; and, although the gentleman from Arkansas may have some assurance that they are not going to interfere with his industry, I have no such assurance with reference to the industries in my district, and I am not willing to give to any individual—the President of the United States or anyone else—the power to lower tariff rates in such a way as to ruin an industry which means so much to the district in which I live.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The paper and pulp industry is now on the free list.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that fact, but this bill gives the President the right to enter into trade agreements.

Mr. FULLER. They cannot raise the duty there under this law.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. While under the bill the President cannot raise the rates on those articles that come in on the free list under this bill, he is given the privilege of freezing those items on the free list. That is inserted in this bill for a purpose that no reasonable man can understand, because it does not mean a thing in the world except that in trading with foreign countries we cannot trade with the only thing that we have to trade with.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that fact, and also the fact that the power to enter into these trade agreements is not going to redound to the interest of industry here.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend has an independent mind, and I respect him. The gentleman ought to realize that the probable field of success of such agreements would be in the freezing of commodities on the free list. That is where the greatest field presents itself for the making of reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. To say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] that this bill gives the President no power to take any article from the free list, he is given the power to freeze something there. We pretend to give him that power, although it is something he cannot use, because it is only by act of Congress that anything can be taken from the free list. It is a lot of "hoey", as we say in Michigan.

Mr. BOILEAU. I think that description would apply generally to all of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In view of the interruptions the gentleman has had, I yield him 3 minutes additional time.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentleman. In considering this legislation from any angle, it must be evident that if we are to enter into any trade agreements and give an advantage to some particular industry, some other American industry is going to be hurt; and it would seem to me that the only fair thing for the administration and the members of this committee to do is to give this House some information as to what commodities are to have their tariff schedules reduced.

Mr. MILLARD. Say sugar.

Mr. BOILEAU. The suggestion is made with reference to sugar. I have the pleasure of serving on the Committee on Agriculture, and the other day we heard a certain representative from the Agricultural Department come before our committee and say that he believes that we should reduce the tariff on sugar because it is an inefficient industry. I pressed the gentleman for further information as to what he meant by an inefficient industry, and he said in effect that any industry that cannot stand on its own feet, any industry that needs the protection of a tariff, is an inefficient industry. If that is the case I must say that the dairy industry is inefficient, because we need tariff for the protection of the dairy industry, and we need a tariff for the protection of practically every other industry in this country to protect our standard of living. I am not fearful that this legislation will result in reducing tariff protection from butter fat or milk and cream. I do not believe the President for the present would reduce the tariff on those commodities, but I do not want to give anybody the power to do so if he should see fit to do so, especially if he has to take advice from the agricultural experts who claim that any agricultural commodity, such as dairy products, that is in need of tariff protection is an inefficient industry. I do not believe any man should have that power, and I, for one, so long as I am a Member of this House will not give the President or anybody else that power.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am well acquainted with the gentleman from Wisconsin and have great admiration for his ability and his purpose, and without in any sense reflecting upon him I want him at his leisure to insert in the RECORD that statement of the Secretary of Agriculture which said that all industries that had a tariff protection were inefficient.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, for the first time since I have been a Member of this House I shall take advantage of the privilege to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I shall insert that quotation.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman recognizes, because of the thoroughness of his study, that our imports in 1933 declined to $1,400,000,000 plus. I know further the gentleman recognizes back in 1929 our imports totaled $4,400,000,000. In other words, in 1929 we had three times as many imports as we had in 1933, and in this connection I want the gentleman to point out any industry in this country, except those which were particularly tariff hogs, holloing because of any deflated Treasury condition or lack of revenues and dividends.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, the gentleman made reference to the reduction in the value of our imports. I wish to say also that the value of American industry materially declined during that same period of time. We should look at the entire picture, if we are to consider the loss in imports.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes, as I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BOILEAU. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Kentucky has called attention to the testimony of Secretary Wallace before the Committee on Agriculture, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] can substantiate what he was quoting.

Mr. BOILEAU. If the gentleman will permit me, I did not say it was Secretary Wallace. I said it was a representative of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is the same thing. He spoke for the Secretary.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, I wanted to have that clear.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention, and also the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the statement appearing on page 57 of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means:

Secretary WALLACE. I can conceive of a situation where Germany, for instance, might be willing to lower the tariff on lard, in case she could move, we will say, some toys into the United States.

Mr. REED. Would you favor lowering the tariff on things Germany produces and ships to this country, and which we produce here in our own country?

Secretary WALLACE. If Germany can produce them more efficiently than we can, it would be of benefit to our customers, as our consumers certainly represent the eventually dominant interest in our population.

Does that not say that Mr. Wallace wants to include importation from Germany of articles that we make in this country?

Mr. BOILEAU. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BOILEAU. No. I do not yield until I have made one statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman does not yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Wisconsin certainly does not need any help from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. I think the gentleman does not need any help from the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not need any help from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman does not yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. In just a moment I will yield. I want to say in reference to this entire tariff question that I perhaps go a little further than most any Member of this House would go. I would not say that I would be in favor of an absolute embargo against any commodity that we can produce in this country, but I will say that so long as there are millions of men unemployed in the United States, so long as we are spending billions of dollars trying to give employment to those men in the United States, so long as we have a condition where men are looking for employment, I, for one, will not permit tariff barriers to be put down to take any of those men out of employment or to permit any foreign labor to come in further competition with American labor. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What I want to keep clear is the statement of the gentleman with reference to what Secretary Wallace said pertaining to tariff industry.

Mr. BOILEAU. I want to keep it straight.

Now, I do not yield further until I make this statement. I did not say Secretary Wallace made that statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Who made the statement?

Mr. BOILEAU. I said that I would put that in the RECORD. It was a representative from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Was it Mr. Weaver?

Mr. BOILEAU. There were three gentlemen who testified. I am not sure of the name at this time. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman knows that Mr. Weaver's statement was repudiated by the Secretary of Agriculture, with reference to his sugar statement.

Mr. BOILEAU. The only thing I can say is that I will put in the quotation if it has not been taken out of the remarks. Sometimes men who give testimony change it completely while revising their remarks.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But I have heard so many misstatements as to what Secretary Wallace has said that I am tired of hearing the statements go unchallenged.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman did not hear me say anything about Secretary Wallace.

Under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include herein a part of the testimony of Mr. A. J. S. Weaver, Chief of the Sugar and Rice Division of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, given at a hearing before the House Committee on Agriculture on February 19, 1934:

Mr. BOILEAU. Just one further question: As I understand it, there is a limitation as to production of domestic sugar in the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. What is the economic justification for limiting the domestic production of an agricultural commodity produced in this country, when we are already producing less than a third of our domestic consumption?

Mr. WEAVER. There are two, I think.

One is the cost of an expansion of the industry to the consumer. The other is the cost of the expansion of the industry to farmers through a curtailment of their market for other agricultural goods which may be exchanged for sugar in areas outside of continental United States.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do I understand, then, that because it is necessary to protect a domestic product by a tariff you consider it uneconomic, unsound, to produce sugar in this country because we must have a tariff in order to protect domestic production?

Mr. WEAVER. It is expensive to the consumer.

Mr. BOILEAU. It is expensive to the consumer, you say?

Mr. WEAVER. It is expensive to the consumer, and the cost to the consumer is far out of proportion, we think, to the benefits to the producers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, there are other commodities, including agricultural commodities, that we must protect by a tariff, are there not?

Mr. WEAVER. There are many commodities which are protected by the tariff, although, as we all know, most agricultural tariffs are of doubtful benefit to the producers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, yes; but this is one where there certainly is protection to the domestic producer, is there not?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; but the costs are far out of proportion to the benefits. I think the figures in the President's message are approximately correct. That is to say, that virtually, that you are guaranteeing an income, gross income, to producers of continental beets and cane of $60,000,000 and it costs $200,000,000 to the consumers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do you want to say, then, as a general statement, that those agricultural commodities that require a protective tariff are necessarily economically not justified for production in this country?

Mr. WEAVER. Well, I would like to know what commodities you have in mind. There might be some.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, for instance, there is a tariff that is rather high on dairy products. It is necessary to have that tariff in order to protect the domestic dairyman.

Mr. WEAVER. I would rather not comment upon that particular tariff. My impression is, as to most agricultural tariffs, that they are of doubtful benefit to agriculture as a whole.

Mr. BOILEAU. I disagree with that, of course.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are now acting, as far as the tariff is concerned in this country, under a nonpartisan body, the Tariff Commission, which has the power of regulating tariffs on imports to the extent of 50 percent of those articles that already have a duty. As to any other commodities that are coming into this country, we can, by an act of Congress, put a tariff on those commodities if the Members of Congress see fit to do so. Is this not fair; is it not just? Then why change a perfectly good, sound, sensible law.

I am firmly convinced of the fact that the regulation of these tariffs is a wise set-up for the benefit of this country. It gives an opportunity to make such adjustments in the tariff as the American people feel should be made, providing the Tariff Commission and the President of the United States can be convinced that it is the right thing to do.

We have heard discussed from the floor of the House the fact that the tariff is for the benefit of the American manufacturer. We agree to that. We agree that it is not only for the benefit of the American manufacturer, but also for the benefit of American labor. It is of benefit to all people in all walks of life in America. Not only do we benefit American labor but we benefit the American farmer. You Members of Congress should realize that every product grown by our American farmers has a tariff on it. On wheat there is a tariff of 42 cents a bushel, on oats 16½ cents a bushel, on corn 25 cents a bushel, on cotton 7 cents a pound, on wool 34 cents a pound, on whole milk 6½ cents a gallon, on butter 14 cents a pound, and all other farm commodities have a tariff. Who would take them off of farm products?

Statements have gone out from Members of Congress that we do not protect American agriculture. For the life of me I cannot see why any Member of Congress should make such a statement as that. It is certainly far from the facts and the truth.

This bill calls for trade agreements to be executed by the President of the United States. Is it possible that the Senate is going to pass such a bill as this and give up its rights, inherent under the Constitution? Is it possible that we as Members of Congress are going to pass over all rights we have inherited under the Constitution to the President of the United States?

It has been emphatically impressed upon my mind during the past 10 days that one of two things should happen, either that the American Congress—that means the House of Representatives and the Senate—should assert their rights under the Constitution or they should go home. I am just about sick and tired of the things we are doing here in Congress—passing the buck to the President because we are afraid to assume responsibility.

I have the highest regard and respect for the President of the United States, but, Mr. Chairman, when we turn over to him, and he in turn must turn over to various department heads the authority which is delegated to him, because there is no man under the heavens big enough to assume all the obligations and duties we are trying to shirk and pass up to the President just because we are not big enough and will not stand up here and assume those responsibilities—I say it is about time for us either to assume our responsibilities under the Constitution or go home.

Should the Senate turn over to the President of the United States its right to make treaties? Neither Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, McKinley, Cleveland, Wilson, nor Coolidge, were they alive today, would be able to recognize the Constitution of this country; it would be a matter of history to them.

I think that today we are setting up what might well be called the Soviet Union of the States of America under the greatest dictator the world has ever known; and I predict that in less than 2 years, unless Congress assumes its responsibility, just that fate will befall this country and our Constitution will not be recognizable. I say to you Senators: Wake up! I say to you Representatives: Wake up! I say to the American people: Wake up! Or something will befall this country that none of us wants to see.

On last Thursday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], the chairman of the committee, made the following statement, as appears from the RECORD:

I am sure the President will not enter into any negotiations or agreements whereby any industry of the United States will be injured.

I say to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and to the Members of the House that during the past 2 weeks the Joint Committee on Printing have been discussing the matter of contracts for paper for the Printing Office for the next 3 months. When we came to the question of newsprint, I asked the chairman why it was that Canadian and foreign newsprint manufacturers were able to quote a much lower price than American manufacturers. The statement was made in reply that operating under the N.R.A. our costs were increased; also, that foreign paper came in free of duty. I asked why it would not be a good thing to place a sufficient duty on newsprint that the American manufacturers might operate under the N.R.A. and pay the wages that the N.R.A. requires the manufacturers to pay. In reply to this one of the Senators made the statement that I raised an improper question at this time.

Mr. W. W. Pickard, who is in charge of the paper industry under the N.R.A., made the statement before our committee that he had taken the matter up with the President in discussing the question whether it would not be a good thing to make some kind of an agreement with Canada whereby they would raise the price of their newsprint paper so that American manufacturers might get some of the business. He made the remark that the President of the United States said, "I hate to see a tree cut"; and that the newsprint industry had better go out of business.

To show you what the newsprint industry means to this country I wrote the Department of Commerce asking for the capital invested in this industry, the number of plants engaged in it, and where they were located, and the number of people employed. Their reply is dated March 22, 1934, and I read it to you:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, March 22, 1934.

HON. ROBERT F. RICH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of March 17, addressed to the Hon. Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, has been referred to this office for reply.

I am informed by the Forest Products Division that a total of 27 newsprint establishments were in operation in June 1933. These mills have an aggregate capital of approximately $200,000,000. In normal times, according to a report by the Association of Newsprint Manufacturers, they gave employment to 9,000 factory workers, but at the time the report was submitted this number had declined to 6,560, while the companies' pay rolls had shrunk to $7,150,000.

Most newsprint mills are located in small towns. In the report mentioned above only three of the mills were reported as located in towns of more than 15,000 population, 11 were located in towns of 5,000 to 15,000, and 13 in towns of less than 5,000. Lockwood's Directory of the Allied Trades, published in 1932, and which probably applied to operating conditions in 1931, or early in 1932, listed a total of 31 establishments manufacturing newsprint. Of this total 10 were reported in the State of New York, 5 in Minnesota, 4 each in Washington and Maine, 3 in Wisconsin, and 5 in other States. Enclosed you will find a table showing production by States for the calendar year 1929, compiled by the Bureau of the Census; also a table showing employment, pay rolls, and annual average earnings for the year 1928, 1930, 1932, and the first 6 months of 1933.

Trusting that this information will be of value to you, I am,
Very truly yours,

WILLARD L. THORP, Director.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. May I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin the President says that the newsprint industry in that part of the country might just as well fold up.

In 1933 the number of employees were 6,560, the pay roll $7,150,000, or an average annual pay roll of $1,090.

In 1932 the number of employees were 6,790, the pay roll $7,850,000, and the average annual pay roll per worker $1,155. In 1930 the number of employees were 8,340, the pay roll $12,750,000, and the average annual pay roll per worker $1,530. In 1928 the number of employees were 8,960, pay roll $13,500,000, and the average annual pay roll per worker $1,510.

The production by States is as follows: For New York, in 1929, 235,072 tons; Maine, 560,626; Wisconsin, 103,458; Minnesota, 121,563; Washington, 140,016; and all other States, 248,434 tons. Besides the number of workers engaged in these plants, it takes two or three times as many workers, because of the industries in existence in those particular States, to keep them in operation. The men who cut the wood, the farmers who sell paper wood, and many other people. May I say also that Mr. W. W. Pickard, of the N.R.A., who gave the Joint Committee on Printing information, stated that about 65 percent of the newsprint came from Canada, 5 percent from abroad, and 30 percent from America. Are we going to fold up 30 percent of the newsprint industry in this country because we put into the hands of the President of the United States this power? I say no. I say it is time for us to stop such foolishness. It is time for us to resume our authority as men and do what we were sent here for. We do not want to pass our rights over to someone in some department, not the President of the United States, because he must depend on somebody else for his information and guidance. I myself do not like the way some of his advisers are directing affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, the policies of the administration as carried out through the Secretary of Agriculture in his efforts to relieve the farmer have always appeared to me to be the wildest of theories. I have wondered for some time just what benefits, if any, the Pennsylvania farmer was receiving from this program, and I am pleased to submit herewith a statement of one of the outstanding farmers in my district, Mr. John W. Cox, of Wilmington Township, Lawrence County, Pa., carried in the New Castle News, Friday, March 23, 1934.

It is encouraging to know that men and women on the farm are rising to the point of demanding common sense from those who administer the agricultural policies of the Federal Government. Congress will do well to heed the protests of practical farmers, who speak from years of experience, rather than those who theorize and do their farming at a mahogany desk.

There is much in this statement that we Members of Congress can profit from. I commend it to you all and suggest that we too adopt the same militant attitude. I might add that Mr. Cox does not know that I am presenting his statement to you; however, I feel certain he does not object if his words of wisdom are passed on to Congress. I am proud to number him among my constituents.

J. W. COX WRITES MORE ABOUT UNITED STATES HOG TAX

I have received congratulations and favorable comments from so many people on my newspaper article published on January 12 on Hog Tax and Farm Relief that I feel encouraged to make more protests against the payment of this unjust and exorbitant tax. I also feel encouraged to continue my efforts in behalf of the Pennsylvania farmer.

Recently I received a letter from the revenue collector, which reads as follows:

MARCH 13, 1934.

J. W. Cox,
Route 5, New Castle, Pa.:

You have been listed by this office as a processor of hogs under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which became effective as to that commodity on November 25, 1933.

Our records fail to indicate any return as a processor of hogs has been filed by you with this office. If you have slaughtered any hogs for market since the effective date of this act, return should be made on P.T. Form 4 for each month any slaughtering was done.

The rates of tax for the various months per hundred pounds live weight are as follows:

November, 50 cents; December and January, $1; February, $1.50; and beginning March 1, $2.25.

P.T. Forms 4 and 29 have been previously furnished you.

PRODUCERS

If you are a producer (that is, owner of the hog at the time of farrowing), no return is required until your sales or exchanges of pork products for the marketing year which began November 5, 1933, exceed 300 pounds, dressed weight.

In case your sales during the marketing year exceed 1,000 pounds dressed pork, you thereby lost the credit of 300 pounds' exemption and must include the 300 pounds for which exemption was taken in your return for the month that your sales exceed 1,000 pounds and pay on same.

If no processing has been done or if you are a producer and your sales and exchanges of pork products have not exceeded 300 pounds, please so advise, using the enclosed envelop, without postage, for making such reply.

DAVID L. LAWRENCE,
Collector of Internal Revenue.

This newspaper article is my reply to this letter.

In my former article I used the soft pedal, but it is out of order now and I will use the medium one. I do not believe that the hog tax is constitutional. If the Government only took 4 or 5 pigs out of every 100, it would be a tax; but when they confiscate from 20 to 35 out of every 100 it would constitute wholesale robbery, and that never was favored by the Government until recently, when they commenced to collect the hog tax.

You may think that I am Scotch. It is enough to make a Scotchman out of a spendthrift to buy western feed, pay a high freight rate, feed it into hogs, and then have the Government confiscate 35 percent of them, without giving anything in return, and hand it over to the western farmers.

The western farmers had their balmy days, when many of them worked during the summertime and spent the winters in Florida while the eastern farmers were working.

At the present time the tax is 2¼ cents per 100 pounds live weight. The tax on a 400-pound hog would be $9. A 400-pound hog will dress about 320 pounds. At 8 cents, the top market price per pound dressed, it would bring $25.60. Tax, $9. Balance left after paying tax, $16.60. Tax 35 percent for a hog that cost about $30 for feed and labor at 10 cents per hour.

Mr. Reader, suppose that you had a herd of 100 nice fat hogs, and some Government official would come around and drive 35 of them away; what would you think? You would probably want to send for that Mercer County man.

A New Castle merchant told me that if he was a farmer he would go to jail before he would pay any hog tax. I said I did not think that it would be much disgrace to go to jail for that. "No", he said, "I think that it would be an honor."

We have been accustomed to saving some hams to sell to our customers in the summer, but we did not save any this winter, except for our own use. We ground them into sausage and sold it before the price got as high as it is now. When our customers come around next summer and want to get one of those country-cured, hickory-smoked hams, they will be disappointed.

Farmers, take courage. We have the sympathy of the professional and business men who, I think, will render financial aid if necessary. We also have the consumers on our side.

Even the most ardent Democrat, if honest and intelligent, will admit that the Agricultural Adjustment Act will work a hardship on the eastern farmer. If he does not admit it, he automatically puts himself into another class.

The administration leaders will tell us that the eastern farmers will profit in the higher prices that they will receive for their pork next year, but how can they profit if they do not have any for sale? The eastern farmers are dependent on the West for much of their feed; and the corn-reduction program, which is a detriment to many of the eastern farmers, will force the price of grain up to where the farmers cannot afford to buy it and feed it into pigs with the possibility of a high tax on the pork. Instead of accepting some of the Government's easy money to decrease his crop acreage, he is going to be forced to increase his grain acreage wherever possible or go short on feed.

The majority of the eastern farmers cannot share in the wheat-reduction program, as they need all the straw that they can produce for bedding for their stock. The southern cotton growers received $112,000,000 last year to destroy their cotton and are to receive $125,000,000 in 1934 to reduce the acreage, $237,000,000. That seems like an immense sum to hand to those cotton growers so that they can sit around and enjoy themselves.

If we don't make a strong protest, we will be taxed on our cows, calves, chickens, eggs, and everything that we produce. I am opposed to the destruction of property and strikes such as the western farmers pulled off, but they succeeded in inducing the administration leaders to tax the eastern farmers and hand the money over to them. Something must be done, and done soon, to relieve this situation.

I quote from a bulletin issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, hog regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture with the approval of the President under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I think that President Roosevelt is sincere in trying to be helpful and on account of not being familiar with farm conditions is an innocent party to this adjustment act. It is not too late to remedy this situation and we are hoping that President Roosevelt will give it consideration soon. He promised that if he made mistakes that he would correct them.

Nearly all of the hog producers in this locality are hog processors as there is very little demand for live hogs.

A farmer from a neighboring township came to see me a few evenings ago to get some information regarding the hog tax. He regretted that he had sent to the revenue office for information and gave them possession of his name. He thinks that the only farmers that they will collect from are the ones whose names they now have.

They may create a lot of new jobs and put a man into every county in the United States at a high salary to check on every farmer who raised a hog and make him swear what he did with every pound of the meat.

I quote from the Pennsylvania Farmer the experience of a Northampton County farmer: "I did not know to whom to pay the tax and figure the exemption, so I wrote to our county agent. He wrote me giving me what knowledge he had and referred me to a collector for our county. I wrote him for blanks and information. None came. So I wrote to our Representative in Washington who sent me bulletins and amendments thereto. About 3 weeks later the collector came in person to me to 'fix up my tax.' I had my reports ready, but here is where the joker comes in. Because of ignorance of the law in this case I owed a penalty besides of 25 percent for November and December, by the time that I knew what and where and who and how. Another pleasant surprise because I could not get around to the right party in time who wanted my dollars."

It isn't high time—the time is just about past doing any good for us eastern farmers to wake up and plan our course or else we take the course of least resistance. The more we think over this sudden overproduction scare the more it seems nothing more than an excuse to tax everything we buy or sell to the limit of our endurance, and yet our public-school history teaches us to honor the noble heroes of pioneer days when they staged the Boston Tea Party.

This farmer surely has a grievance, and he expresses it in a mild way. Our administration leaders tell us that the way to bring back prosperity is to relieve the farmer and increase his purchasing power.

If one listens to the talks over the radio by the Government officials, it sounds rosy; but if you want to learn the true situation, ask some farmer.

I do not want to be so pessimistic, but I am driven to it. While I am in the proper mood I want to take a whack at our Pennsylvania State Legislature. While the taxpayers have been demanding economy they have continued squandering the State's money. At one of the recent sessions a bill was passed creating a milk-control board, consisting of three members, with an annual salary of $6,000 each. Total, $18,000 for salaries, and $100,000 for operating expenses. All legislative members who voted for that bill should be left at home the next session. Taxpayers, wake up. Talk will not get you very far. Get into action and do something. Comments on this letter, both favorable and unfavorable, will be appreciated. If the necessity exists and I get sufficient encouragement, I will write again, using the hard pedal.

JOHN W. COX,
Wilmington Township, Lawrence County.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 236

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, for a number of years I have been one of the board of trustees of a Negro community center in my home city known as "Hering House." I drew the deed of trust whereby a generous and public-spirited woman conveyed property worth many thousands of dollars to this board for the use of the colored citizens of South Bend. It serves the several purposes of a Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., and a community center. It works in closest cooperation with the white Y.M.C.A. and with the other social, religious, relief, and employment agencies of the city. It has been a creator of character. It has promoted harmony and understanding among all classes in our community.

No one who has given his time and means to its support has ever regretted it. I doubt if any dollar dedicated to character building and citizenship goes farther than it does there. My work on that board has been one of the things in my life in which I have the greatest satisfaction.

It was natural, therefore, that I listened with sympathetic interest to the speech made the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST]. I wish to commend him for his temperate and restrained remarks. He touched a high note when he said:

I have repudiated communism everywhere.

What he said confirms my own experience with the Negro race. They have been and are and will remain as loyal to the flag as any group in this country.

I think Mr. DE PRIEST's resolution should be adopted by the unanimous vote of the House. It does not attempt to prejudge or solve in advance any issue that is involved. It simply asks for an investigation by a committee of this House of a policy that was first established some 12 years ago and has since prevailed during three Republican and the present Democratic administration. It is not a partisan or political question.

Let the House, representing every congressional district in the Nation, appoint a fair-minded committee to work out a solution of this question that will promote good feeling among all classes of our citizens.

WHO DEFEATED THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY?

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, every daily newspaper in Wisconsin is lamenting the defeat of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, yet not a single editor mentions the prime cause of the 46 to 42 vote in the Senate, with a two-thirds vote necessary to adopt the treaty.

During the past 15 years Wisconsin and other Northwestern States have paid nearly a half million dollars to the St. Lawrence Tidewater Association or Charles P. Craig on the assumption that Craig and his association were pushing the waterway. Wisconsin alone has contributed more than $50,000.

This association's public record shows:

First. That it has never been militantly for the waterway.

Second. That it has always been indifferent and half-hearted in its support but militant in arousing opposition to the waterway.

Third. Until the treaty was actually introduced in the Senate the State of Illinois paid Craig's association thousands of dollars annually, and Illinois along with the railroad owners in New York has led the opposition to the waterway.

Fourth. The association wants a waterway on paper for political purposes, and their own acts and official record over the last 15 years proves they have never served any other purpose.

I contend the association never secured a single one of those 46 affirmative votes while its lukewarm lip service interspersed with enemy trades of dealing with the opposition doubtless contributed at least one half of those who cast the 42 votes against the treaty.

The association was deaf and dumb during the days preceding the vote. Then came defeat and immediately the association launches a campaign for a revised treaty to please the Illinois and other opponents of the waterway. On the strength of this new betrayal the association hopes to perpetuate itself in office and cash incomes. The people of the Northwestern States will continue to pay.

For 15 years the cause of the St. Lawrence waterway has been in the hands of its enemies and Wisconsin newspaperdom laments the effect and continues to ignore the cause. All of which causes this writer to join the Biblical character, Job, in the lament, "How long, O Lord, how long."

The St. Lawrence Tidewater Association lent its services to the Hoover campaign in 1928 and again in 1932. Early in 1928 I introduced a resolution urging immediate action on the St. Lawrence waterway and immediately Frank B. Kellogg, then Secretary of State, called me to his office and asked me not to press my resolution. He showed me the confidential draft of a treaty with Canada and said that arrangements had been about completed looking to the nomination of Hoover and his election would insure the building of the waterway. Kellogg and Craig both told Members of Congress and the people of the Northwest to elect Hoover and we would get the waterway.

In 1928 the people did elect Hoover. He was President for 4 years and never even brought the treaty up for ratification. He betrayed the people of the Northwest who voted for him on that issue. The Tidewater Association betrayed them because never once during those 4 years Hoover was in office did Mr. Craig's association ever complain or insist that action on the treaty be had. Not once during those 4 years or since has Mr. Craig's association done a single act offensive to the Morgan-controlled railroad interests in New York or the power interests who own and operate the Chicago Drainage Canal.

Not a single opponent of the waterway has ever charged or expressed any resentment against Mr. Craig or the association because of their activities in behalf of the waterway.

Think of it! This association was paid over $500,000 in public cash, no accounting, no expense vouchers, no real records, over a period of 15 years, and they did not do enough for the waterway to incur the ire or even displeasure of a single opponent.

The people of Wisconsin and the Northwestern States want a waterway on the water to lower their cost of transportation on everything they sell and almost everything they buy. We want the waterway to restore water transportation, the one natural resource belonging to the Great Lakes States.

You will never get it with a milk-and-water organization representing us, like the St. Lawrence Tidewater Association want a waterway on paper for political purposes and to preserve their soft and extremely lucrative jobs.

If it had not been for President Roosevelt's support of the treaty, the waterway would never have had a chance of passage in the Senate. Everyone knows that. Yet the association under Mr. Craig was an active partisan supporter of Mr. Hoover in the last campaign and Hoover's backers were the Morgan-Mellon crowd who are fighting the waterway.

Once again I join Job in his deep and earnest lament, "How long, O Lord, how long."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 315

Resolved, That notwithstanding the adjournment of the House, the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign enrolled bill of the House H.R. 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I call up a conference report on the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman withhold his unanimous-consent request for the present?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this point to insert in the Record the following tribute from various sections of the country other than his own, which they have recently paid to Representative WILLIAM B. OLIVER on the anniversary of 20 years' service as a Member of the House from the State of Alabama.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Everyone knows of the high esteem and respect in which the people of the State of Alabama hold the Honorable WILLIAM B. OLIVER. The following tributes from sections of the country other than his own have recently been paid to Representative WILLIAM B. OLIVER, of Alabama, on the anniversary of his 20 years of service as a Member of the House from Alabama:

Secretary of State Cordell Hull:

"The completion of 20 consecutive years of service in the House of Representatives is an event which calls for congratulations from the friends of the Member who has achieved so long a record. The congratulations, however, which I am offering to my friend, WILLIAM BACON OLIVER, on this occasion are not so much based on the length of his service, impressive though it is, as upon the scrupulous, conscientious, and able manner in which he has discharged the responsibilities intrusted to him.

"During my period of service in the House of Representatives it was my pleasure to know him as a colleague and as a friend. I had occasion then to become familiar with the high-minded manner in which he represented his district and with the wisdom which he brought to bear upon our national problems.

"I am therefore happy to pay tribute to this prominent citizen of Alabama and leader in our National Congress, and to offer to him and to the people of his State my congratulations at this milestone in a record which we hope will reach far into the future."

In a letter addressed to Congressman OLIVER by Attorney General Cummings he said:

"The records disclose that you have served the people of the Sixth Congressional District of Alabama in the House of Representatives for 20 years.

"It is, of course, common knowledge that your distinguished service has not been confined to your constituency. As the head of the Department of Justice, whose officers have been in intimate contact with you for many years, permit me to express my appreciation for your sympathetic cooperation and constant interest in the welfare and efficiency of this Department. Law enforcement in the United States owes much to your earnest and sincere work and helpful suggestions.

"I congratulate you upon the results of your long service. I congratulate the people of your district for their wisdom in retaining you in their and the country's service."

Secretary of the Navy Claude Swanson:

"I have known the ability and courage of my old friend from Alabama since my days in the United States Senate. I have always known the responsible position he has held as a leader in the party and in the House since the very first days he entered Congress two decades ago. He has shown the qualities of statesmanship that I am always proud to see in Members from the South. Always interested in the welfare of his State and his section, he has always shown that broad-minded nationalism which truly indicates a great American. We are all proud of him."

Secretary of Commerce Daniel C. Roper:

"I believe he is now rounding out two decades of service in the House of Representatives. It has been my pleasure to observe him intimately these 20 years, and I want to congratulate him on the splendid record which he has made during this time."

"Many men serve effectively and conscientiously for their districts, but few men serve their districts and the entire country as effectively. The former is a good Congressman; the latter is a statesman. These critical times emphasize the importance to the country of the breadth of service which comprehends our entire country. As a friend and as an American citizen I take pride in his record and in his conscientious and able service on the Appropriations Committee. I hope that he will be able to render many more years of such service, and I trust that many years of service lie before him."

Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins:

"Congratulations to Representative OLIVER in his 20 years of loyal and devoted service in his district, State, and Nation. It has been marked by courage, intelligence, and vision in the performance of tasks performed in the interests of all of the people of the Republic. During the past year it has been a source of gratification and pleasure to know him."

Speaker of the House of Representatives HENRY T. RAINES:

"As a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House he has handled the bills committed to his care with a wisdom and a thoroughness that has saved thousands of dollars to the taxpayers and to the Treasury. In the momentous days of the past year he has not only given loyal and devoted support to President Roosevelt but he has been a valiant champion of the new-deal program."

"In felicitating him on his twentieth anniversary of service in the House of Representatives I do so in the belief that he is now at the point of his greatest service to his constituents and to the country. I am confident that my appreciation of him and his services is shared by all of the Members of the House of Representatives, irrespective of party lines, and that his very high standing in the Congress must be a source of gratification to his constituents."

Senator JOSEPH ROBINSON, of Arkansas, Democratic floor leader:

"There is no better-liked Member of the House than Representative OLIVER. There is no leader so responsive to a call from his leader at the White House. During the many years I have known him he has been an effective public servant to his district and State. He has always exhibited those qualities of statesmanship which have marked our most noted Members of either body of Congress."

Representative JOSEPH BYRNS, of Tennessee, Democratic floor leader:

"No man in the House has rendered more devoted and faithful life service to his district, State, and Nation than BUCK OLIVER, who has just completed 20 years of service in the House. I served with him for many years on the Appropriations Committee. I know that his influence is felt in all of our legislative deliberations. In addition to that, he is one of the most influential and popular Members of the House. The people of his district are to be congratulated on their representation here."

Senator McKELLAR, of Tennessee:

"I have known Representative OLIVER since our days in the University of Alabama and he has always been one of my closest friends. I wish to join with others in congratulating him on his long service as a Member of the House. I know that he has devoted his life to the service of his district and State, and it is gratifying to know that this service has been recognized by his fellow Alabamians. He has shown those qualities of statesmanship which have marked the greatest figures in our national history."

Representative SNELL, of New York, Republican floor leader:

"Although on the opposite side of the aisle, I have always admired the ability and courage with which Representative OLIVER has handled his appropriation bills, whether in the majority or in the minority. He has always been eminently fair to Members on both sides. This has enabled him to do much effective work for his party. I admire his statesmanlike qualities."

Representative BUCHANAN, of Texas, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee:

"Representative OLIVER has been one of the most valuable members of my committee. He has helped save his country millions of dollars each year. To him has been entrusted some of the most important appropriation bills, including those for the Navy and other large Federal departments. He is an expert in fiscal matters and his judgment is trusted by me and every other member of our committee."

Mrs. GREENWAY, Representative from Arizona:

"Some people are truly what the rest of us would like to be, and Congressman OLIVER is an example. He possesses self-restraint that bespeaks wisdom and strength, modesty that evidences the habit of power, and a presence that all unconsciously revives and sustains one's faith in the ideal of public service. To hear his least comment is to recognize a statesman."

Representative CONNERY, Chairman of the Labor Committee, Massachusetts:

"Representative OLIVER is one of my close personal friends. I have always admired him as one of our finest Members; courteous, kindly, able, and courageous. In those matters in which I have been particularly interested Mr. OLIVER has always exhibited the keenest and most sympathetic interest. He has the courage of his convictions and always votes as he believes is in the best interest of his country. No Member of the House enjoys in larger degree the respect and confidence of his colleagues than Mr. OLIVER, on both sides of the aisle. In presenting important appropriation bills assigned to him he is always informative and his remarks carry conviction. I may say he is one of the most indispensable Members of the House."

Representative TABER, of New York, member of the Appropriations Committee:

"For 12 years Representative OLIVER and I have been on the committee together. During that time he and I have been close personal friends. There is no man who gives more of himself to the public service than he does. I am delighted to congratulate him on his 20 years as a Member of the House."

Representative COOPER of Ohio, Republican member of Interstate Commerce Committee:

"Congressman OLIVER has been in Congress as long as I have. He has been a worthy foe on the other side of the aisle. We have always seen eye to eye on labor problems. He has always been a friend of organized labor and the workingman. I congratulate him on his long service."

Representative PATMAN, of Texas:

"I think Congressman OLIVER is one of the most sincere and able men in the House. He has as many friends as any other Member of the House. I think this is particularly important in view of the fact that as a Congressman he has two constituencies—one his district and one the House. A Representative cannot work as effectively for his district unless he is popular in his House district. I have been most impressed with the efficient and courageous manner with which Mr. OLIVER has been able to handle the important bills assigned to him on the floor."

WILLIAM B. OLIVER,
ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
C. W. WOODRUM,
ROBERT L. BACON,
FLORENCE P. KAHN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. So far as I know, there is no opposition on this side to the conference report, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] would like a few minutes on the conference report.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I may say to the gentleman from New York that the senior minority member of the subcommittee [Mr. BACON] was called away on account of a death in his family. He told me that he was in hearty concurrence with the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. He so advised me.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I want to commend the distinguished services of our colleague, WILLIAM B. OLIVER, who has now served in this House for 20 years. He is even known up in the wicked North, in my district, where he has a friend in Col. James E. Dedman, who is in charge of the Castle Point Hospital, and every time I see him he wants to know how his old friend, BUCK OLIVER, is. Belonging to the other party, I am glad to state, without fear of contradiction, that Representative

OLIVER is an outstanding leader of his party and typifies in the House, from long training and experience, what a Member with such seniority should be. He has the ability, industry, and knowledge to legislate properly and intelligently; and as a ranking Republican member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I want to commend him for his knowledge of foreign affairs upon the Appropriations Committee and congratulate him on the way he has handled such appropriations in his committee. [Applause.] I know full well that all Members of the House on this side join with me in hoping he will be here for another 20 years. [Applause.]

I wish to say a few words about that part of this conference report which calls for an appropriation of $1,100,000 for an embassy at Moscow.

About 4 months ago, when the President suddenly determined on recognizing Soviet Russia, the members of the "brain trust" who were most active in trying to show preference to Russia, told the American people that we would do a billion dollars' worth of trade if we merely recognized the Soviet Government and that it would buy hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of cotton from us.

I take this occasion to point out that last year, or in 1933, we only did $8,717,000 worth of export trade with Russia, and in 1932 our exports amounted to $12,466,000, and yet we are providing an embassy over there that will cost probably $1,200,000 before we are through, or one seventh of the amount of our export trade. We exported to Germany about $139,000,000 worth of our goods in 1933, and we have no embassy building there.

I am not opposing this appropriation. So long as we have recognized Soviet Russia, we should have an embassy, and we should have a dignified embassy, but I am pointing out that if we are going to build an embassy in Moscow we at least should build one in Berlin and one in Rome. Over 100 American citizens will go to Berlin and Rome for every one that goes to Moscow; and so far as trade is concerned, our trade with both of the other countries is at least 10 times as much as it is with Russia.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I recognize the importance of our trade with both of the countries to which the gentleman has referred. I think a mistake was made by the Foreign Building Commission in the purchase of old buildings in Berlin and also in Rome. The gentleman from New York will recall that we now own a building in Rome and one in Berlin, the one in Berlin cost about $1,750,000, and the one in Rome about $1,250,000. We had hoped that one of the buildings in Rome could be transformed into a residence, but later we found this to be impracticable. I feel the purchase was a mistake and for that reason we inserted in this bill a proviso that no part of this money should be used for the purchase of old buildings.

Mr. FISH. After we have passed this legislation and provide this money for building an American Embassy building in Moscow, I hope the gentleman will help to provide sufficient funds to build one in Berlin and one in Rome.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes, and I may say to the gentleman that we do own a building in Berlin which cost $1,750,000.

Mr. FISH. That building burned down.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No.

Mr. FISH. It was gutted by a fire and is not being used.

We do not own the ground at Moscow; we take it on a 99-year lease, and therefore we do not control the land. It is located 2½ miles out of the center of Moscow. How American citizens are going to get there, I do not know. There are no taxicabs. It is out of the center of the city where the hotels are located and where business will be done. You might as well build an embassy in Chevy Chase as to build this where we are building it.

It is a beautiful location in a park on the Moscow River and will make a beautiful residence for the Ambassador, but as far as the American citizens are concerned, I do not know how they are going to get there unless we establish a fleet of taxicabs.

I made a few remarks the other day in which I said I had come to the conclusion that Mr. William C. Bullitt, our Ambassador, was a pretty smart man, that he knew a good deal about Russia and might be smart enough to be able to take care of himself. Only yesterday, however, I read in a newspaper that our new Ambassador at Moscow for whom we are providing this palatial residence, is about to enter into an agreement with high Soviet officials in an effort to have the United States and Soviet Russia enter into the League of Nations together. That is the report in the newspaper. I hope we are not paying an American Ambassador to go to Moscow in order to get us into the League of Nations with Soviet Russia. I believe in keeping out of entangling alliances, and in not getting into any agreement with Soviet Russia or any other foreign nation for the purpose of entering the League of Nations. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, in view of the very gracious remarks of my good friend, the gentleman from New York, it is difficult for me just now to disagree with him about anything. [Laughter.]

I may say that the President of the United States from newspaper statements is not at this time in favor of our entering the League of Nations. [Applause.] I will say to the gentleman that the cost of the Embassy in Moscow is to be less than the cost of the Embassy in Tokyo, and it is thought that the Embassy they have planned in Moscow will be far more complete. It is a beautiful location, as reported to the committee, and the committee seemed to be in full agreement as to the suitability of the site.

The President sent a very strong letter to both the House and the Senate in favor of this program. It involves a 99-year lease at a nominal yearly payment of $2,000, which is less than one half of 1 percent of the actual value of the land, the conferees were informed.

I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, before I address myself to the conference report, I would like to take this opportunity to say something about my good friend Buck in addition to what my colleague from New York has just said.

The gentleman from Alabama knows a lot about foreign affairs, but I want to say that he knows more about naval affairs than he does about foreign affairs. He is highly regarded for the work he has done on the Naval Affairs Legislative Committee as well as on the Appropriations Committee during his 20 years in Congress. While we all love you, Buck, some of us had an idea that you might want to go to the Senate some day from your State, so I hope you will not stay here for another 20 years, because you will then be too old to go to the Senate. Your constituents do themselves proud when they reelect you from time to time.

I rose to call attention to one or two items in the conference report. There appears to be a million dollars additional in the first item, amendment numbered 2, and another million in amendment numbered 3. They are very much alike, one applying to living-quarters allowances, amendment numbered 2, and the other applying to allowances for rent and heat, and so forth. They are very much alike, yet there is a million dollars added in each of these instances. How does that come about?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. While the gentleman is correct in stating that there is an increase—to be exact, $954,000—in both amendment no. 2 and amendment no. 3, amendment no. 2 merely increases the amount of the limitation by that sum while amendment no. 3 actually increases the appropriation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Why was it necessary to increase the House appropriation $1,000,000 in each instance?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The appropriation was increased only to the extent of $954,000, as indicated by amendment no. 3. The House appropriation carried a very limited amount for that purpose, and the State Department, with the approval of the Budget, recommended that additional sum on account of the unusual conditions now prevailing abroad in many countries. We have put the same limitation on the amount that may be expended that has been carried in former years, and the whole matter will be very carefully watched, with a view to seeing that no excessive allowances are made to any Ambassador, Foreign Service officers, or clerks.

Mr. BRITTEN. By the usual allowances the gentleman means the $3,000 in one instance and the $1,700 in the other for the Foreign Service officer?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; the amounts you mention are the maximum limits.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is any of this amount made necessary by the exchange situation in the past year because we have gone off the gold standard?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That may enter into it, but this appropriation will be taken into account in any sums hereafter submitted for deficiency appropriations to cover the exchange situation the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BRITTEN. I listened with considerable interest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] in what I will not call his opposition to the $1,165,000 appropriation for a new building in Moscow, and I think that when we aim to appropriate $1,000,000 for an embassy or an embassy residence in a country like Russia, where the location of the capital is always in doubt, that we should be very careful. The capital has changed several times. We have had one experience in Turkey in that respect, where we had a very beautiful legation building at Constantinople, and when the Government became weak they just moved the capital 1,000 miles or more to the east. China has done the same. I have been in Russia during recent years, and my impression is that there is danger in erecting any million-dollar building in Moscow because of the instability of the Government itself.

Gentlemen may say that the Government has been going on for 8 or 9 years, and that it is not unstable, but the capital of Russia was at one time in Peterhoff, named after Peter the Great. It was then moved from there to St. Petersburg, and that still was named after Peter the Great. The name of St. Petersburg was then changed to Leningrad, and it stayed there for a while, and finally was moved to Moscow. My impression is that the logical place for the capital is not Moscow but the place where the capital was for a long time, Leningrad. They may move back there, and if they did, the rental of a building over there would be vastly to our advantage rather than putting up a million-dollar structure, which would be useless for any local use, because the Russians do not live as we do. I am glad that the House conferees insisted on amending the amendment by providing for a new building and not the purchase of an old one, because I had carried in my files for some time this notation about the Embassy in Moscow that our Ambassador had gotten over there and had purchased an enormous building. The report that I have in mind states:

Ambassador Bullitt (William C.) will sleep in a baby-blue bedroom, adjoining a bathroom 25 feet square, surrounded by all the glories of the Czarist era.

The embassy is the palatial 40-room mansion of Russia's former sugar king (Tverkov) and has been re-done for Bullitt, but all of the dangling chandeliers and stained-glass windows and marble staircases and heavy damask hangings of the vanished days have been preserved.

A dining room will seat 300 people.

The show place of the embassy is the ballroom, surrounded by marble columns and decorated with crystal chandeliers 10 feet in diameter.

The reception hall will accommodate 40 couples for dancing.

There are eight master bedrooms.

The building was completed just before the World War. The owner was shot during the revolution, and the building has since been used by various Bolshevik political bureaus.

That type of building could always be sold for something over there in the event of the removal of the capital, but the kind of building that we are going to build for more than a million and a quarter would be useless to Russians in any walk of life. I think the gentleman's amendment is good, because it will provide for the expenditure of American money for American type of construction.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not know whether that is an accurate description of the building the gentleman refers to or not.

Mr. BRITTEN. This came from over there.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the full allowance which the State Department is permitted to make for rent, heat, and light is made to the Ambassador to Russia, he will still have to pay a very substantial amount as rent for this building. The building program which we are here providing funds for does not contemplate simply a residence for the Ambassador, but there will be quarters for all of our Foreign Service representatives who are stationed at Moscow. Likewise, there will be offices for all representatives from the different departments of our Government who may be stationed there.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is an Embassy for official purposes and a residence as well?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is the idea of the plan?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am very glad to have the gentleman's viewpoint, because I regard his opinion very highly, but I am sorry that at this time, when there is so much being said about Red activities—and there is a great deal of it in the big cities especially, much more than most of us comprehend—we should at this time be more or less throwing a flower or a kiss to the Bolsheviks in Russia. Call them what you please—Communists, Soviet States, or otherwise. I think it will be misconstrued. It will look like a little flattery. It will look as though we are going out of our way to cater to the Russians when, as the gentleman from New York said awhile ago, we might be catering in some other more desirable direction.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I say to the gentleman that I recognize there are differences of opinion, of course, as to the probable effect of the President's recognition of Russia, but I believe those who are best acquainted with conditions throughout the world feel that in recognizing Russia the President has done much to silence all rumors of war in the near future and has made a real contribution to world peace.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not complaining about the recognition of Russia. I was speaking of the unwisdom of spending all this money now in Russia, at a time when there is so much unrest and so much fear of Communist propaganda here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I simply wish to ask the gentleman some questions. Of course, my tribute to my friend and colleague from Alabama is in the Record, which I have asked unanimous consent to extend, together with the Members of the House, the distinguished Cabinet members, and other people.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. All of which are very deeply appreciated.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman deserves all of that tribute. I should like to ask the gentleman if the entire $4,000,000 for the Unemployment Service is now in the bill?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. It is $3,700,000.

Mr. CONNERY. When the Wagner-Peyser bill was before the Committee on Labor we brought in the three legislative representatives of the veterans' organizations, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled Veterans' organization, and the American Legion, on the question of offering an amendment to the bill which would provide for separate offices for the veterans. It was made very plain at that time, when those amendments were passed, that a separate office was to be set up every place where we had an employment office, for the purpose of obtaining positions for veterans, and they were to be in charge of a veteran. Since the law went into effect they have not been doing that, have they?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; they have not.

Mr. CONNERY. Yet it is clearly written into the bill, because we felt that a disabled veteran coming into a United States employment office would find it more difficult to get a position than an ordinary man, because a manufacturer would not want a disabled veteran, and we felt a veteran should be in charge of the office, or at least a veteran should be in charge of the veterans' part of it, to try to get positions for the disabled men. Did anything come up about that in the conference?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Permit me to say that the statements made by my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts when this bill was before the House led me to conclude when we were in conference that there should be a proviso requiring that the minimum amount to be expended for veterans' placement service should be not less than $200,000, and such a proviso is carried in the conference report, which sum is an increase of $56,000 over what the Bureau stated they expected to spend for this service. In view of the gentleman's statement as to what the committee, of which he is the distinguished chairman, felt was the purpose and intent of that legislation, and how he felt it should be construed by the Department of Labor, I am confident they will make a liberal allowance for the veterans' placement service. They cannot spend less than $200,000.

Mr. CONNERY. One thing more. We have unemployment set-ups in many of the States, and the Government is going to cooperate with them, under the Wagner-Peyser bill. Will they take care of the States that do not have those set-ups?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In other words, will they go into States to try to encourage those employment offices?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because I think every Member will be interested in this statement. The gentleman has correctly stated that the Wagner-Peyser Act provided that for the first 2 years the appropriations might be expended in setting up Federal employment offices without requiring the States to match the allocations made to the States.

We find that for the first year the Department had not been carrying out the law in this regard. So after this bill went to the Senate, and after the House had denied the full amount recommended by the Budget, since we did not want to pile up appropriations unless they were to be spent, I conferred with the Secretary of Labor and found that she was entirely sympathetic to setting up immediately these Federal employment offices in every State, under authority vested in the Secretary by the Wagner-Peyser law, and there will be speedily set up in every State employment offices within the limits of the amounts which the appropriations for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935 allow to the several States for this purpose. Forty legislatures meet early in 1935, and if these employment offices are rendering a worthwhile service we feel sure that the States will see that the offices are continued by matching Federal appropriations for the fiscal year 1936, since the law requires this beginning with the fiscal year 1936.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman inform us what the architecture of this building will be? There is a rumor that it will be something like our university down at Monticello, Va.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that is the tentative plan they are considering.

Mr. GOSS. Has it been approved?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I cannot say it has been approved. A commission composed of 3 Cabinet officers, 2 members from the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, and 2 members from the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate constitute the Foreign Building Commission and are clothed with full authority to determine the type and character of the buildings to be constructed within the limits of the appropriation carried.

Mr. GOSS. Is it to be built by Russian labor?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think only unskilled Russian labor will be used; and all of the material except such as cannot be transported at a reasonable cost will be purchased and transported from this country.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 5 and agree to the same with the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of Senate no. 5 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment no. 8: Page 15, lines 2 and 3, strike out "$3,500; in all, $579,948" and insert the following: "$4,075; in all, $580,523, together with such additional sums, due to increases in rates of exchange as may be necessary to pay in foreign currencies the quotas and contributions required by the several treaties, conventions, or laws establishing the amount of the obligation for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 8 and agree to the same with the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 8 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$3,500; in all, $579,948, together with such additional sums, due to increases in rates of exchange as may be necessary to pay in foreign currencies the quotas and contributions required by the several treaties, conventions, or laws establishing the amount of the obligation for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment no. 19: Page 33, line 15, after "$10,000", insert the following: "Provided further, That reports be submitted to the Congress on the 1st day of July and January showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation or amount of any fee paid to each, together with a description of their duties."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment no. 21: Page 44, after line 23, insert the following: "Provided, That a report be submitted to Congress on the 1st day of the next regular session showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation paid to each, together with a description of their duties."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I think this statement will prove of interest: All of the increases inserted by the Senate represent Budget estimates submitted by the President to the Senate after the bill left the House. It may be of interest also to know that for the fiscal year 1932 there was appropriated for these four departments $139,069,937.34. The pending bill for these same four departments carries $88,884,522, showing a saving since the fiscal year 1932 of $50,185,415.34. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the action was taken on the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SIGNING BY VICE PRESIDENT OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a statement which the Clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chair desires to announce that, under authority of the order of the Senate, he signed, after the recess on yesterday, the enrolled bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, said bill having previously been reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills as having been examined and found truly enrolled.

REPEAL OF ALASKA PROHIBITION LAW

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, is necessarily absent on business of the Senate. I wish to present a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration out of order.

The bill (S. 2729) to repeal an act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes, contains the following provision:

Provided, That the Governor of the Territory of Alaska, from and after the passage and approval of this act, shall have the power and authority to grant pardons to persons theretofore convicted of violations of the aforesaid act of February 14, 1917.

In the opinion of many authorities, including the Chief Executive, and, I think, also the Attorney General, that proviso is unconstitutional. I am, therefore, presenting for the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] a concurrent resolution requesting that the President return Senate bill 2729 to the Senate in order that it may be revised. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 11) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2729, 73d Cong., 2d sess.) to repeal an act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE FOR THE LEGISLATIVE ESTABLISHMENT (S.DOC. NO. 165)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the legislative establishment, under the Architect of the Capitol, fiscal year 1935, for maintenance, Senate Office Building, in the sum of $84,000, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the mayor and council of the Borough of Cresskill, Bergen County, N.J., favoring the passage of the so-called "Kenney bill", being House bill 3082, to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so as to extend the provisions thereof to provide emergency financial facilities for municipalities, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a petition of sundry citizens, being members of the Farmers Union, of Carroll County, Md., praying for the enactment of the so-called "Frazier-Lemke farm loan bill", which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Cumberland, Md., and Chicago and vicinity, in the State of Illinois, praying for the adoption of Senate Resolution 154 (submitted by Mr. TYDINGS), opposing alleged discriminations against Jews in Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.
